But from the date of Paul's introduction to Kate Sabin (in the kitchen of her father's house, one Sunday afternoon), there occurred a notable change in his behavior. He went to Newman Street so frequently, after office hours, that I do not like to think of the amount of deception he must have been guilty of to have kept the nature of his attraction a secret from his grandparents. He stayed out late—sometimes as late as midnight. His presence at home, of evenings, became rather the exception than the rule. And he persisted in this reckless libertinism—it appeared little else to Mrs. Gower—in defiance of all remonstrance, rebuke, and scolding. So that things had arrived at the state already indicated in our first chapter, to which I may refer the reader for the different but perfectly characteristic way in which the old lady and gentleman regarded them.

I have nothing to urge in Paul's excuse beyond the fact that he was very much in love. From that memorable Sunday evening he could not be happy out of the society of Kate Sabin—nor in it. It was his first passion, omitting one or two experiences proper to extreme juvenility; but as little pertinent to this story as his still earlier maladies, the measles and hooping cough. This affection for Kate, however, really struck in, permanently influencing his mental and moral constitution. Very likely it would have been better for him if it had proved, in common with most first passions, a windfall, giving place in due time to riper fruit; but circumstances and his disposition combined to produce an opposite result. These mould all our versions of the same old, inevitable story.

It was not mere "half-love" with Paul Gower; he really loved the blooming daughter of the old painter with a depth and fervency which she was quite unworthy of, and only in part comprehended. The sound of her voice, the very rustle of her dress, affected him with a delicious pleasure which was half pain. Her ways, her manner, as she went about her household duties, possessed an indescribable fascination for him, totally irreconcilable with reason or his colder judgment. He saw her, of course, through a glorified medium, but had he been capable of knowing her as she was, I doubt if it would have made any difference. Sometimes he obtained shrewd glimpses of the truth, but they never sufficed to break the enchantment. Very possibly he suspected that his passion was irrational and absurd, yet he was none the less under its influence. A man shall be convinced in his own heart that no good can come of his success, that peace and happiness do not lie there—nay, shall be sure of the moral perversity of her he worships—yet shall be ready to risk life and soul to get her. There are drunkards quite conscious of their condition, but incapable of reformation; opium eaters who find it impossible to resist the delights of the drug which is destroying them. I fear these must be old comparisons: they seem inevitable.

Did she return it? Paul thought so, sometimes; and it always cost him a pang to suspect that his passion awoke no more response than was the uncertain echo of its own intensity. She, herself, would have been puzzled to answer the question truthfully. At first, her gratitude or good nature or vanity, or all three, induced her to respond so warmly to his pleading that he lived for a time in a fool's paradise, which he would never have willingly quitted. Then she certainly liked him. He was better looking and better mannered than any of the young artists who dropped in of evenings to drink gin and water with her father; who wore shabby coats of cotton velvet and long hair, smelt of tobacco and made Paul savagely jealous by their perpetual sketches of her. He was indubitably more in love than they were; and the ardor and pertinacity of his pursuit may have misled her into fancied reciprocation. Had his position permitted, at this period, he might easily have persuaded her into a foolish marriage, irrespective of consequences: had his passion been as unscrupulous as it was ardent, he might have done worse. But, luckily for both of them, the first was out of the question; while that worship of the sex which Dick Sabin alluded to, in his conversation with Harry Franklin, as characterizing young lovers, rendered the contemplation of the second impossible. Paul would have hated himself if such an idea had entered his head. Otherwise, there is no knowing what might have happened. Long afterwards, when he approached the moral climacteric mentioned by Richard, he recollected many occasions in which his modesty exceeded her own, though with none of the peculiar regrets implied by Sabin. He was always glad that he could think of the past without cause for self-reproach, or dishonor to her memory.

Time, however, tended to estrange the lovers (if such they may be called) rather than to bring them closer together. Paul went to the house so frequently, that it became something of a bore to Miss Kate, especially when he was exacting or jealous, as was often the case: she would have preferred a lover a little less tremendously in earnest; though to do her justice, his long face seldom deterred her from any coquettish she had a mind to. Perhaps, after all, she gave him as much as she had to give, and he was to blame for insisting on overdrawing the amount which Nature had placed to her credit. It has been shrewdly remarked that in love there is always one who loves, while the other is content to be loved; and a very little observation will convince us that by far the larger proportion of human beings go through life without any extreme experience of the great passion, either active or passive; their capacity only extending to a moderate average, to be bestowed upon the first eligible person of the other sex who solicits it. It is because of this, that most marriages are neither particularly happy nor particularly miserable, but merely commonplace.

Paul Gower was troubled with no such reflections. He went on loving Kate Sabin with scarcely any thought of the future, and no more anxieties than were caused by her behavior towards him, to which he was painfully sensitive. When she flirted, he always appeared at a pitiable disadvantage, betraying great want of tact, irritation, and misery. He didn't know, or knowing, couldn't reduce to practice the fact that, in wooing a coquette, he who feels or exhibits the least jealousy inevitably has the best chance of success; because he can avoid unpleasant manifestations and avail himself of the pique excited by his coolness; while an opposite course of conduct invites all that capricious beauty may choose to inflict and insure personal humiliation. Sometimes Paul bore this, sometimes he flamed into indignation, sometimes he remonstrated, with more or less effect, according to Kate's humor. She knew her power over him and abused it with an unscrupulousness which was thoroughly feminine. Was there ever a slave who was always well treated, I wonder?

Apart from his principal attraction to the house in Newman Street (if he could have admitted the exception), Paul thought it one of the pleasantest of places, and old Sabin the jolliest and kindest of old boys; as indeed he was. He had a welcome for all his sons' friends and acquaintances, who were free to come and go on the premises, almost at pleasure. When at home, he seldom quitted his studio; and, as his wife nearly lived in the kitchen (where the family took their meals), only emerging therefrom on Sundays or special occasions, the girls had the parlors to themselves, and could admit what visitors they chose, with perfect impunity. Occasionally Paul spent an hour or so in the studio, watching his opportunity to slip out to Kate; sometimes he did not enter it for a week together. The only person belonging to the establishment of whom he was afraid was Mrs. Sabin, who had been known to summon her daughter from a tender interview by calling imperatively for her from the bottom of the stairs, and even, when provoked by delay, repeating her demand from outside the half-opened parlor door. On such occasions the guilty Paul shrank within himself and departed without the usual protracted leave-taking at the street door, where the lovers generally lingered an unconscionable time, indulging in osculatory and other familiarities. Once Kate told him that if ever they quarrelled after marriage, they must come to that portal in order to repew old fondness by the force of association. His passion was an open secret to all the family, nobody attaching much importance to it. Between him and his friend Richard, there existed one of those unspoken confidences on the subject common among young men, though Dick privately regarded it as "all nonsense;" Tib and Frank teased, connived, and abetted; Mrs. Sabin disapproved, but seldom actively; while if her husband gave himself any concern about the matter, it was to laugh both at his daughter and her admirer. Paul could never have enjoyed such opportunities in any less desultory household.

Its palpable irregularities troubled him very little; I think he rather enjoyed them, as the moral antipodes of what he experienced at home. At one-and-twenty, we are not fastidious about the relatives of the beloved object, especially when they allow us easy access to her. Besides, most of us have a secret liking for Micawberish people, both in real life and in books; their disregard of the stricter moral obligations make our own short-comings seem quite venial in comparison; they are agreeable devil's advocates, who put in a plea in favor of all the easy demi virtues against the hard, positive ones, which dispense with all others. Paul even knew of the Wornum episode, indeed had helped to instigate Kate's revolt against that lean, unfortunate woman, whom he greatly distrusted (suspecting her of perfectly imaginary designs for the contamination of Miss Sabin); but he was fain to imitate that young lady's resignation, when she returned home, as she was only too glad to do, and be civil to the supposed enemy. If it ever occurred to him as it probably did, that his grandparents would have been extremely scandalized by his intimacy with the Sabins, he kept such speculations to himself. He had got into hot water once or twice by risking satirical comment on some of the family peculiarities; for, as I have previously remarked, Kate shared the sensitiveness of the female portion of it with regard to its vulnerable points. She had even gone to the length of collecting all the pairs of snuffers in the house (two and a half) in order to convince him of their existence, on his doubting it and remarking on the very common habit of using scissors or fingers, in lieu of those useful implements. And he had discovered the antecedents of the hasty marriage of Kate's elder sister (who borrowed her mother's wedding-ring to effect it) from Mrs. Ball's flashing out into an apparently uncalled for passion on Paul's innocently rallying her about her supposed conquests before assuming that name, which set him thinking and induced inquiries. It was best, he found, not to ruffle the susceptibilities of the ladies.

I have said he went so frequently to Newman Street that Kate found it something of a nuisance, which she occasionally abated by sending Mills to Soho Square, with little cocked-hat notes, begging her too ardent lover to "be a good boy and go home," as "they were washing," "mother was so cross and, she knew, wouldn't let her come up stairs," and similar statements. Whereupon Paul would invite Mills to tea with him, at a coffee-house in Oxford Street, subsequently accompanying him to the forbidden door, to envy his ready admission, to linger in the vicinity until he had excited the suspicions of the policeman, and then depart homewards, feeling as if there were a whole cycle and abyss of time between that and to-morrow evening. The number and length of the letters he wrote to her were, even for one in his condition, prodigious. Frank offered his sister half-a-sovereign for them as a speculation in waste paper. He tried poetry also, and with sufficient success to secure the publication of some of his verses in a country newspaper, of which we shall hear hereafter. Paul kept all her answers, to the smallest pencil-scrawled "Good night!"—sent when she was unable to bid him one verbally—for many years, only destroying them when—but I shall come to that in due time.

CHAPTER XII.

In addition to their facilities in-doors, the lovers met, on summer evenings, in Bedford Square; the Sabins possessing the privilege of entering the inclosure in virtue of John's residence. Kate used to call and get the key, sometimes taking charge of her little nephews and nieces, those innocents being pressed into service as what I have heard denominated "gooseberry-pickers" to their seniors. This proceeding, however, involved risks, for the artless prattle of the children on one occasion conveyed to their parents (and the terribly respectable Thorntons) the news that Paul had kissed their aunt repeatedly in the arbor; after which scandal Miss Sabin insisted on his abstaining from such familiarities, except at Newman Street, where he was at liberty to make himself amends. There, the presence of Frank, or Tib, or Mills, necessitated no particular restraint, unless the two former were inclined to be disagreeable or mischievous. As for poor Mills, he played third-party with admirable discretion, trotted on errands, kept watch and ward when Mrs. Sabin threatened interruption, and made himself generally useful. He was a born dependant and hanger-on, a perfectly guileless and single-hearted parasite, who did everything short of cleaning boots, or knives, or windows, that the Sabins chose to put him to. He had become the involuntary confidant of both Paul and his mistress; and many a night had walked home with the young man, listening to or condoling with him, or explaining away the coquetries and crudities of Kate Sabin. Paul never felt that there was anything absurd in this queer friendship, and the time came when he thought very sadly and tenderly of poor Mills' untiring kindness and patient sympathy.

Under all these circumstances, adverse and congenial, Paul had persisted in loving Kate Sabin for over twelve months. It was scarcely a happy time, made up of extravagant devotion on one side, of fluctuation between liking and dissatisfaction on the other. Sometimes her capricious favor exalted him to the height of felicity; anon her coldness or coquetry filled him with despair and jealousy. Such exhibitions of feeling on his part, as that described in our first chapter, were every day rendering her more and more inimical to his suit and willing to break off; only she wanted the necessary resolution. Latterly, too, she had involved herself with another admirer. She began to be afraid of Paul, to suspect that his passion demanded more than was in her power to grant, and, lacking an equal return, might chafe itself into misery, which it would inflict as well as suffer. She had experienced something of this, she thought, already. But she was unable to make up her mind on this subject; so she only avoided Paul, played with and tortured him, until the chapter of accidents should produce a decision.

When he told her of his father's letter (which he did, perhaps, with a little latent self-importance, and certainly a hope that she would exhibit some interest or emotion), he was signally discomfited by her behavior. She supposed he would go, as a matter of course, and as if there were no conceivable reason why he should not be ready to expatriate himself, immediately and for evermore. Wasn't it his duty to do so? She also eulogized America and Americans with equal fluency and ignorance, talked affectionately of her brother Tom (who had left England when she was about six years old), and declared that Mr. Wheeler had impressed her so delightfully that she should like to accompany that gentleman on his return to a country which possessed so many advantages over her own—wondering if he were married, and so forth. She surmised that the ladies of Louisiana must be very handsome. It was only after a scene, and much personal humiliation, that Paul obtained an admission that she did care whether he went or stayed; and further conversations elicited no greater encouragement than was involved in the assertion that he certainly ought not to let any sentimental considerations hinder him from accepting the good fortune presumably awaiting him in the New World, coupled with a perceptible resentment of his desire to go thither. Miss Sabin and old Mrs. Gower might have shaken hands in sympathy on the subject.

To do Kate justice, however, she hardly thought of the matter seriously, or, as Mr. Wheeler would have said, realized it. Paul couldn't go yet awhile—until his father sent the money for his passage. In the meantime, a letter had been despatched by his grandparents to Buzzard's Bend, Carroll Parish, Louisiana, expressive of their willingness to part with him and his readiness to undertake the voyage.

"Miss Sabin is n-not at home, sir. She w-went out half-an-hour ago with Mr. Mifflin."
"Oh, Mills! what a crammer! How can you?" And the poor drawing master was suddenly rushed at, seized by his coat collar and shaken, until his back came into smart collision with the street door which he had just opened, in answer to Paul's application at the knocker. "T-tibby!" and "Kitten!" was all that could be heard of Mills' remonstrances, while the young lady who had pounced upon him—really in a manner justifying the feline appellation he bestowed upon her—proceeded to apostrophize her victim as "an old wiper," and to threaten to have the "werry life of him" if he did it again—the objectionable course of conduct being unstated.

"I'll come in," said Paul, suiting the action to the word and entering the back parlor, whither Mills and the kitten followed; that playful creature still hovering round the drawing master and harrying him, though with abated energy.

"You may as well tell me," Paul continued, when these attentions ceased and the breathless Mills was repairing damages. (His coat, by the way, being a very old one, had suffered so much from the juvenile members of the house of Sabin that it was quite a phenomenon of darts and patches.) "It's not the first time, you know."

"But it isn't, this time, Paul, dear!" responded Tib, with great volubility. She was a sharp looking girl, with good features, thrice Kate's impulsiveness, and a general tendency towards private theatricals on all possible occasions.

"And Mills ought to be ashamed of himself—there!"

"B-but I saw 'em with my own eyes," insisted that person, getting into a corner and holding up his hands in deprecation of further hostilities: "Miss Sabin and Mr. M-miff—"

"Mills!" screamed the girl, making another swoop at him, rendered abortive by Paul who took her by the waist, when she succumbed to circumstances, only relieving her feelings by short, shrill shrieks and stamps, and feints of a desire to dart at the drawing master and rend him in pieces, whenever he opened his mouth.

"Come, Tib, there's quite enough of this," Paul said, with some impatience, and was proceeding to further inquiries about Kate, when he was interrupted by the appearance of the slatternly girl from the adjacent mews—who commonly dispensed with such formalities as knocking at the door.

"Missis says she won't have sich a noise hupstairs and Miss Elizabeth's to come directly and she wants Mr. Mills to go of a errand." Thus the slatternly girl, without stops.

"C-coming, Polly!" stammered the factotum of the family, not sorry to embrace the opportunity of escaping; while Miss Elizabeth merely told the girl to "go to Jericho," apparently preferring Paul's knee to a maternal scolding.

"You victim of the tender passion," she began to that young man; "I'll tell you all about it, as that old blab can't keep his mouth shut. Kitty went out, just after tea, with her best bonnet and my warm shawl on—for which she'll just get particular toke when she comes back, and so I tell you! And if Curtis Mifflin bolted after her—leaving me and Mills in the unperilous manner, I must say—how was she to help it? If you say a word, Mills, I'll go into hysterics and scream the roof of the house off!" Which double catastrophe Mills prudently declined provoking.

"It's my birthday," Paul remarked, rather ruefully; "I thought she would have remembered it." Whereupon Tib embraced him with much affection, pouring out congratulations on the anniversary, apologies for her sister's absence, and assurances of her speedy return, which lasted until Mills had visited the kitchen and reappeared, carrying a basket.

"I'll go with you," said Paul, as the drawing master put on his shabby old hat and comforter, in preparation for out-of-doors; and they quitted the house together, Tib accompanying them to the threshold, talking all the way. Arrived there and perceiving an acquaintance on the other side of the street, taking in beer at the area-railings, the young lady then ran across to her and remained bare headed, conversing, until Polly was sent to fetch her back.

Mills' errand was the fetching of some tripe for the family supper, from a shop in Tottenham Court Road, renowned for the preparation of that delicacy. In the course of their walk thither, he told Paul the circumstances attendant on Kate's absence from home. Premising, in his accustomed phrase, that kittens would be kittens, and that it was advisable, as a general principle, to recognize that fact in natural history and to be aware of their claws, Mills stated that Miss Sabin had gone on a visit to an old lady who lived in Bloomsbury Square, and who was the aunt of Mr. Curtis Mifflin; being especially invited thereto by her nephew. He had come to the house, Mills added, at an early hour in the afternoon, and spent the greater portion of it with the young ladies in the front parlor, where Kate had sung and played to him. Tib's correction was both based on no stronger fact than the circumstance that her sister, after coquettishly refusing the invitation and then accepting it, had declared that she would go unaccompanied, and so ran off alone, to be pursued and of course overtaken by Paul's rival.

Now the attentions of this Mr. Curtis Mifflin towards Kate had caused Paul much more disquiet than he chose to avow to that young lady, or, indeed, to himself. He was a very different kind of rival than the rough, jovial, free-and-easy young artists who haunted her father's house; being a pale, slim, and rather gentlemanly young fellow of nineteen, articled clerk to John Sabin, solicitor, in which capacity he had recently made the acquaintance of the old painter's family, when the daughters received him with considerable favor. There had occurred a competition between the sisters in order to decide, as Tib expressed it, "who should have the captivatin of him." Surrendering to Kate, he became, in a very brief period, her most devoted and dismal of admirers. He was one of a class of youth which is, I suppose, extinct nowadays (when young Britons affect cynicism instead of sentimentality), but which was common enough not very long ago,—youth who gave themselves airs à la Byron, turned down their collars (when it was a singularity), wore long hair, talked about blighted hearts, fate and suicide, and went about looking preternaturally wretched—in a word, the originals of Mr. Dickens' delightful caricature of Mr. Moddle. At first, Kate made a joke of the passion she had excited in the breast of this forlorn swain, and showed his letters to Paul who ridiculed them, assuming a candor and absence of dislike to the writer which he was far from feeling. But Mr. Mifflin's folly was real enough to affect his happiness, and presently Kate began to pity him. She thought him miserable, and herself the cause. She listened to him, at first from coquetry, then with curiosity, then interest. Probably she contrasted his disposition with Paul's, not always to the latter's advantage; his high-flown sentimentality with the fervid, exacting passion of her lover, attributing more disinterestedness to the former. His inferiority of intellect made her perfectly at ease with him, while it relieved her of any unpleasant sense of responsibility, like that which was transforming the tie which bound her to Paul into an iron fetter. She had begun to like Mr. Mifflin's letters, to answer them, before Paul suspected what was going on.

It is uncertain whether, at this period, she really contemplated installing Mr. Mifflin into that place in her affections which Paul had never really occupied, but he got hints to that effect from Mills and others, and presently credited them; though for one naturally of a sensitive and jealous temperament, he continued suspicious for a long time. But Mr. Mifflin came to Newman Street so often—almost as frequently as Paul—that that young man's latent dislike could not fail to manifest itself. He began to ignore his presence, at first coldly, then insultingly; and to assume a familiarity of behavior towards Kate which he had not, till then, ventured on—at least before others. Angered at this, and compromised by half-confidences with her new admirer, she resented it the more deeply for her apparent inability to bring about an open rupture; while his feelings found vent in melodramatic airs, which Paul treated with derision. Dread of him drew them together, inducing mutual championship. So that everything conspired to render Paul's conduct distasteful to his mistress, and to recommend the new comer.

Of two-thirds of all this Paul was, of course, ignorant; nor had any overt act occurred to enlighten him as to how far Miss Sabin had progressed towards being off with the old love, if not on with the new, till now. He received Mills' information with a keener pang of suspicion and jealousy than he had, as yet, experienced. All day long had he been buoying himself up with hopes of a reception appropriate to the anniversary, and of an unusually happy evening; and now Kate was away, preferring the company of that infernal little puppy of a Mifflin. It was too bad, altogether!

He went back with Mills and the tripe, in the worst possible spirits, scarcely listening to the attempts at consolation volunteered by his humble friend, and the door being opened by Polly, ascertained, not at all to his surprise, that Miss Sabin had not returned; and then took refuge in the studio. Old Sabin was there, and, as it happened, alone, in a paint-stained jacket, engaged in cleaning his brushes; a task ordinarily devolving on Frank, but which that young scapegrace frequently neglected. Kate's father had just completed the restoration of a picture, involving the re-painting of half of it, to which, after his usual hearty greeting, he invited Paul's attention.

"There, Gower," he said, "cheerful subject, isn't it? What do you make of it?"

The picture—a formal one, of about three feet square—represented a woman with a very straight figure and a fanatical face, framed by a black kerchief and surmounted by a wide-brimmed sugar-loaf hat, standing on a barrel (the top of which was decidedly out of perspective), and apparently preaching to a select congregation of sour-visaged, sombre-looking men and women in an old-fashioned kitchen, while a cat surveyed the assembly, from the vantage-ground of a high window-sill, with an aspect of justifiable disfavor. It was evidently intended for a Puritan meeting, of the time of the Commonwealth.

"Whose is it?" asked Paul, after he had made the above guess.

"It belongs to a man who came here a month ago with my nephew, Mr. Pennethorne. He made a queer bargain with me about it, too," the old painter added, chuckling. "What do you think, now? I'm going to take out the value of my work on it in cheese!"

"In cheese?" inquired Paul, smiling.

"In nothing less—at tenpence a pound. He proposed it. It appears that he has had this picture ever so long, with wild ideas as to its value; and, coming here and getting friendly with us, offered to sell it to me, or to let me dispose of it on commission. Finding I didn't care about it, he thought he might as well have it put to rights; so I undertook the job on the terms I've mentioned. He wouldn't spend money on it—said he couldn't afford it; but as he'd taken a hundred weight of cheese from somebody for a bad debt, he wanted to get rid of some of it. So we can have plenty of Welsh-rabbits this winter, for supper." And the old boy revelled in a laugh which shook his jolly double chin, and did one good to listen to.

"I hope you won't be disappointed in the quality," suggested Paul, who had heard of Mr. Pennethorne from his friend, Harry Franklin.

"My dear boy, there's no fear of it. —, where he lives, is a great place for cheese, or used to be. Besides, I stipulated that Dick should act as taster, and if he approves, it'll do, I know. Have you heard from him recently?"

"I've not had a line from him, though I've written twice. Harry, however, said that he was enjoying himself, shooting."

"Poaching, he meant," returned the senior, wagging his head. "It's the same story with us. Dick is the worst letter-writer in the family, which is saying something, too. I don't believe he can spell decently. Gower, you must let us know how he gets on in America, if you go there together; he'll be sure to neglect it."

Paul promised, with a sinking of the heart, as he thought upon the transatlantic correspondence with Kate, on which he had calculated. "I shall hardly start before next year," he added, rather ruefully. "We've not heard from Louisiana yet, and my grandfather and grandmother object to a winter passage."

"You want to be off, then?" inquired old Sabin, a little surprised at the tone in which he spoke.

"Well, not exactly," was the still doleful response. "But I should like to see something more of the world than London, where there's no better place for me than a clerk's, in some architect's office, at thirty shillings a week, with the prospect of a rise to two pounds, and nothing beyond. I am not very fond of the profession, and don't think I should ever distinguish myself in it. I like drawing the figure better. Besides, without making any great pretence of filial affection, it is but natural that I should want to see my father, who asks me to come to him."

"To be sure! And what sort of a life do you expect to have of it in what-d'you-call-it, eh?"

"Well, it would puzzle me to answer very definitely. I suppose most of my ideas of Louisiana are derived from Uncle Tom's Cabin. There's time enough to think of that when I get fairly started." Paul spoke flippantly, for he felt miserable, and was all the time vexed by a fierce unrest which scarcely allowed him to fix his mind on the topic of which he was conversing.

Whether he perceived this or not, old Sabin changed the subject and began talking about pictures, his business, and things in general, until he had completed the purification of his brushes and palette; when he did as much for his hands, and then put on his best coat and hat for a visit to Bedford Square. He was always very particular as to his personal appearance on such occasions, regarding an invitation from "John" with no small degree of respect and reverence. He would as soon thought of requesting his son's company to a tripe supper in the kitchen, as of conversing with him as familiarly as he had been doing with Paul Gower. So, after a good deal of bustle and preparation, in the course of which Tib was called in to brush and smarten up her father (which she termed "tittivating" him), he was presently dismissed at the street door, in a state of great splendor and complacency, looking like the jolly old boy he was and (as his daughter remarked) "a credit to his profession and family."

Paul, ordinarily as much at home in the house as if he lived there, did not return to the studio, whence the light was removed to the back parlor, where he resumed his jealous vigil, being occasionally looked in upon by Mills and Tib, who oscillated between the kitchen and his company. He could very well have excused them if they had left him to his own bitter thoughts. Mills was alarmed at his pale face and troubled manner, and strove in vain to soothe him. Paul had become savagely, miserably jealous.

I BELIEVE

IN GOD the FATHER ALMIGHTY, Maker of Heaven and Earth; and in JESUS CHRIST His only Son, who was conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried. He descended into hell; the third day He arose from the dead, He ascended into Heaven, and sitteth upon the right hand of GOD, His Almighty and Heavenly Father; from thence He has come to judge the quick and the dead!

I believe in the Church of Christ, the Communion of Saints, the forgiveness of Sins, and in the Resurrection of the body of JESUS CHRIST, the Son of the Living and Everlasting GOD! — Amen.

JOHN. HENRY DENIG.

JACK'S SHEPHERD.

We profess to have the LORD for our Shepherd. Therefore, when we say that the proprietor of our paper is Jack's Shepherd, we mean that the LORD owns the whole concern, and that John—or "Jack"—is only a servant in the LORD's employ.

JOHN. HENRY DENIG.

We place a period after our name John. We claim that this is John, spoken of in Rev. i. 3. Also, there was a man sent from GOD, whose name was John. And he came unto his own, and his own received him not. Further, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the LORD, as said the prophet Isaiah."

And of whom Isaiah speaks, chapter XL: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots; and the spirit of the LORD shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and light, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD; and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the LORD; and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears: but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth; and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked."

Chapter LXIII. 3: "I have trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemer is come. And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury, and I will bring down their strength to the earth."

"JACK SHEPHERD."

This cognomen we retain since it is written of us. And it is written in Revelation XIX. 12: "And he had a name written, that no man knew, but he himself."

The above are a number of our "crazy" or foolish points. But reader, judge ye, who is crazy—the editor of this paper, or the host of loud-mouthed religionists who act like a pack of hell-hounds after a sheep of CHRIST's fold.

But remember that "GOD has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise."

(For THE INDEX.)

SUNDAY ON THE HILL-TOP.

Only ten miles from the city,—
And how I am lifted away
To the peace that passeth knowing,
And the light that is not of day!

All alone on the hill-top!
Nothing but God and me,
And the spring-time's resurrection,
Far shinnings of the sea,

The river's laugh in the valley,
Hills dreaming of their past;
And all things silently opening, Opening into the Vast!

Eternities past and future
Seem clinging to all I see,
And things immortal cluster Around my bended knee.

That pebble—is older than Adam!
Secrets it hath to tell;
These rocks—they cry out history,
Could I but listen well.

That pool knows the ocean-feeling
Of storm and moon-led tide;
The sun finds its East and West therein,
And the stars find room to glide.

That lichen's crinkled circle
Still creeps with the Life Divine,
Where the Holy Spirit loitered
On its way to this face of mine,—

On its way to the shining fates
Where angel-lives are led;
And I am the lichen's circle
That creeps with tiny tread.

I can hear these violets chorus
To the sky's benediction above:
And we all are together lying On the bosom of Infinite Love.

I—I am a part of the poem,
Of its every sight and sound,
For my heart beats inward rhyming
To the Sabbath that lies around.

Oh, the peace at the heart of Nature!
Oh, the light that is not of day!
Why seek it afar forever,
When it cannot be lifted away?

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED previously, Nine Hundred and Sixty-Seven Shares, $67,000.

The Index.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers. The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO," and all cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the payment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Please send all matter intended for any particular issue of THE INDEX at least a fortnight in advance of date. We shall be very greatly obliged by attention to this request.

William Lloyd Garrison uttered a cutting truth, when he said: "As to the loftiness of the pulpit, though the old-fashioned mode of erecting it was somewhat elevated, the weather-cock on the spire finds a more lofty position than the pulpit occupant; but both commonly indicate which way the wind blows."

A private letter suggests that we open a column of "Answers to Correspondents." We would gladly do so, if we were not sure of being asked a thousand questions we could not possibly answer; and it would be tiresome to print a column every week filled with nothing but—"Don't know!" If we were only as wise as some people!

A few weeks ago a respected member of the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention, now in session at Philadelphia, wrote to us as follows of the probable action of that body: "The Committee on the Bill of Rights intend to report a preamble 'acknowledging the sovereignty of God,' &c., as an amendment of our present Constitution, which does not attempt to declare or enact what he is." The result of this movement will be awaited with no little interest. Petitions favoring it are in active circulation.

The Christian Cynosure, of Chicago, declares in its issue of Feb. 18 that the "Demands of Liberalism" would "place the monogamy of our Savior and the polygamy of Brigham Young on a perfect legal, moral, and religious level." The "monogamy of our Savior," if his example is to be the supreme law of his disciples, seems to enjoin universal celibacy. But, waiving all references to Jesus and Brigham Young alike, we do not hesitate to say that we regard monogamy as the system that is most consistent with natural morality, and that we by no means wish to introduce the harem in any shape as an American institution.

Rev. Daniel Schindler, who formerly edited the Christian Radical at Pittsburgh, Pa., is now editor of a new paper called the Living Christian, and published at Providence, R. I. Mr. Schindler is a man of ability, which he is still devoting to the task of proving that Christianity is "an unsetting power." If he means Catholicism, he is right in one sense; for Catholicism, when in power, "unsets" the world by killing off all who join any sect but its own. We doubt, however, whether this is what Mr. Schindler means. If by "Christianity" he means Protestantism, we leave him to settle his little quarrel with history as best he can.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

Mr. Frothingham gives us this week a very amusing report of the Convention just held in New York, in favor of putting a creed into the Constitution. By all the accounts we have received, it was evidently a less successful meeting than that at Cincinnati last year. It was a hazardous experiment to hold a meeting in New York; and it appears not to have favorably impressed the public or the press. Mr. Frothingham's conclusions that the movement is "intensely hostile to cultivated free thought," and that "thus far it has no hold on the popular mind," are undoubtedly correct; and in fact we had derived the same conclusions from what we had seen, heard, and read before. The movement is still young, and, like all movements which aim to change or develop public opinion, it must require time to become popular.

The failure of the present Convention to carry the public mind by storm is not, therefore, any proof that the movement itself will always be insignificant. The inherent strength of it (and we still think it immensely strong) lies in the logic of its ideas. Yet this inherent strength is apparent to those only who clearly recognize the practical necessities of the Christian Church in this country, and the impossibility of its permanently sustaining itself in a community in which freedom grows more and more every day to be the dominant idea of the national development.

Consider for a moment the question of the Bible in the schools. Does any thoughtful observer of the times believe that our public school system can be thoroughly secularized without a desperate struggle on the part of the Protestant churches to retain this dearly-prized symbol of their political supremacy? Cincinnati is as liberal a city as can be found in the United States; yet the Liberals have thus far failed to remove the Bible from its schools because of the one word "religion" in the State Constitution. The case is to come up again before the Supreme Court of Ohio; but its decision will not be final. In some shape and at some time, the question must come up before the Supreme Court of the United States; but the United States Constitution as it now is cannot be wrested to support the retention of the Bible in the schools, and the Liberals must then succeed. This necessary issue stares the Protestants in the face. Either they must submit to the exclusion of the Bible from the schools, or they must amend the Constitution so as to retain it. If they are in earnest in their religion,—if they believe that they ought to have Bible-reading in the schools,—if they have a particle of faith left in the Orthodoxy they profess,—they cannot help themselves; they will be forced in spite of themselves, sooner or later, to favor the Christian Amendment. Unless sincerity and earnestness have all died out of the Protestant heart, the great body of Protestants will yet be found, whatever they now say or leave unsaid, to fall into line with the little knot of Christianizers who at present are urging their mis-called "reform." Yet who will venture to declare that the Protestant Church of America is to-day destitute of all deep-seated convictions as to the truth of their religion and the right to defend it against Catholicism and Liberalism? Whoever ventures to say this is a fanatic of unbelief.

It is this irresistible logic of ideas, this practical necessity of things, that gives to this wild and reactionary crusade of the Christianizers its formidable character. Their Conventions may be contemptible in point of numbers, influence, wealth, respectability, and culture; but the men who conduct them see the danger to Protestant supremacy and the only escape from it. Peter the Hermit was only a half-crazy fanatic; but he turned all Europe loose upon Palestine. Just so long as that Christianity survives out of which this Convention has sprung, so long will the possibility of another irruption of fanaticism remain. We care less than nothing whether the Conventions succeed or fail, except as they indicate the degree of awakening to its own condition in the Protestant Church. We only see that the Protestant Church is to-day a great power in the republic; that this power is threatened increasingly by free thought and Catholicism; that the only way to preserve it is by getting control of the State; and that no power has ever yet been surrendered without a desperate struggle. This is enough. It more than justifies the warnings already given against the latent peril of the Christianizing movement.

But it would be a great mistake to regard the Liberal League as proposed merely, or even chiefly, to oppose the present Christianizers. Its objects are independent, and contemplate the positive reform of existing abuses. It is a movement to hasten and complete that process of gradual secularization which has been going on ever since the settlement of this country. Let it be carried forward on its own merits. The republic cannot rest on a safe basis until natural morality, natural freedom, natural equality of rights, have taken the place of that "Christian statesmanship" which has lately come to such conspicuous grief in the Crédit Mobilier. Keep the Constitution as it is, and bring the whole administration into harmony with its unsectarian provisions.

NO REASON FOR INACTION.

The New York Methodist of February 8, referring to the Liberal League movement and the opposite demands of the Liberals and the Catholics, says: "Between the pressure from the one and the other side, it may become important for us to embody in our fundamental law both the Christian and Protestant standing-ground of the nation and the State."

That the explicit expression of what Liberalism must demand, as the true fulfilment of the American idea in the administration of the government, should operate in two directions at the same time, is no more than we have expected from the beginning. It will make the advocates both of secular and ecclesiastical government more distinctly conscious of what their respective principles require. It will make the Liberals more earnest in demanding the abolition of all existing forms of ecclesiastical influence in legislation; it will make the Church party more earnest in fortifying what advantages they now possess, and will dispose them to attempt to usurp still more. Each tendency will become more pronounced and definite; each side will seek to strengthen itself for the coming issue.

For the "irrepressible conflict" is upon us already; there is no evading it. Anomalies and inconsistencies exist in our political system with regard to ecclesiasticism which are a devouring cancer in the republic. Especially is this true as to our public schools. Far-sighted men on both sides clearly discern this fact. The Catholics, the Protestants, and the Liberals advocate antagonistic policies in our general educational system, and its safety is already profoundly imperilled. We know the dangers of the struggle now rapidly approaching; but we believe in the wisdom of courage. Let the issue be made. If justice and truth are on our side,—if they exact the thorough secularization of all our political and educational institutions,—let us not flinch from any peril, but seek at once to bring the discussion to fundamental principles, to enlighten the people as to the vast interests involved, and to meet the decisive question with decision. In a word, let us boldly carry the great idea of secular freedom into action, even though for a while this open policy seems to strengthen the party of ecclesiastical interference. It is time to put aside all timidity, and run some risks in behalf of our own posterity.

It is well to learn wisdom from the history of the anti-slavery movement. The demand for "immediate emancipation" frightened hosts of callow abolitionists, gave the pro-slavery party a pretext for new encroachments, and seemed to threaten great danger to the cause of the negro himself. It was declared premature, rash, perilous, sure to increase the power of the enemy and to check the gradual formation of a better public opinion. No doubt there was truth in all this. But history vindicated the uncompromising attitude of the anti-slavery reformers. By their direct appeal to the conscience and intelligence of the nation, they arrested public attention as they never could have done by a more politic course, and laid the foundations deep and strong for the final triumph of freedom. So must it be to-day. We care nothing for any incidental gain that may accrue to ecclesiasticism by publishing frankly the entire programme of Liberalism. Truth and right must gain more in the end, or the universe is gone to seed. By that faith THE INDEX lives or dies. Whatever indirect help may be given to the reactionists by the formation of the Liberal League, a direct and greater help must be given to the party of progress. Forward, then, and cast all fear to the winds!

"A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT."

"That eminently just and scrupulous sheet, the New York World, after exposing the mischievous folly of the attempt to Christianize the Constitution of the United States and yet expressing personal respect for those who are engaged in it, continues as follows in its issue of February 18:

"Along with this proposition comes its pendant in the shape of a very scurvy proposition from persons to the number, so far as appears, of two, of whom one is named Abbot and the other Dinsmore. Nobody is called on to profess the respect which nobody feels for these objectionable and liberal persons. But we wish to call the attention of the well-meaning persons who might be beguiled into believing that the religious amendment was somehow a good thing, to the fact that the irreligious amendment is its logical counterpart, and that Abbot and Dinsmore have the same rights under the Constitution which they propose to tinker in the interest of irreligion as have Bishop Bedell and Dr. McCosh under the Constitution which they propose to tinker in what they consider the interest of religion. If Abbot and Dinsmore become the majority, they would have the same right to incorporate their notions in the Constitution as the propounders of the religious amendment have to incorporate theirs. The only prevention of either calamity is to lay it down that religion is the concern of individuals and of corporations formed for religious purposes, and not of the corporations formed for secular purposes, of which the State is one."

Inasmuch as the two "persons" honored by the World's disrespect propose nothing that is not advocated by itself in the closing sentence of the above extract, and have never dreamed of "tinkering the Constitution," which in respect to religion is all that it ought to be, we leave our critic to enjoy, undisturbed by us, the peaceful slumbers which come to every one who is above all malice and untruthfulness.

Rev. Mr. Buckley is represented in a New York paper as having said, in a meeting of Methodist ministers, that "every Christian has a right to some infirmity." So far as our observation extends, this is a right most tenaciously clung to.

It is pleasant to agree with the Christian Register so thoroughly as we can in the following sentiments:—

"Charles Sumner's old popularity seems to be coming back to him with great rapidity. Almost every day we hear men who censured him last autumn expressing earnest hopes that he may recover his health. And there is a substantial similarity in what is said of him: 'His judgment sometimes errs, his temper is by no means perfect; but let us be glad and proud that Massachusetts has at least one man in public life who is without fear and without reproach.' Who ever dared to go to him with a doubtful proposition? What stain is there on his white record? God save the incorruptible Senator!"

In commenting on the Christianizing Convention, the New York Herald says with great force:—

"However we may acquit the projectors of the amendment of an intentional irreverence on account of purlblindness, we do not hold them guiltless of a deliberate intention to abridge the liberty of conscience in America. Their pretensions once acknowledged, a Jew or an Infidel would be outside the Constitution. By this means, the first limitation of conscience would be achieved. The elimination of objectionables would pave the way for further aggressions, and the first steps would be taken to the formation of a State Church. Herein lies the magnitude of the danger from permitting religious meddling with the Constitution. It would make no man a better Christian than his God was in the Constitution; it would, if accomplished, be the precursor of what we have most reason to dread—a union between Church and State."

IS RADICALISM VOID OF RELIGION?

The charge is sometimes brought against THE INDEX, that, though it is a journal "devoted to Free Religion," there is very little that is religious in it; that it is mainly critical, negative, destructive—stimulating, it may be, to inquiry and discussion, but containing little that is spiritually uplifting, little of that nutriment which will feed the deep hungers of the soul, and enrich it with holier aspirations and with a true trust and joy. This charge comes from two classes of persons: first, from those who think that radical thought is not necessarily void of religiousness, but that certain radical thinkers, and particularly those who chiefly shape the thought of THE INDEX, in the emphasis they give to the idea of freedom lose sight of the other idea, that of religion; second, from those who think that the rationalistic mind is necessarily ignorant of certain spiritual experiences which, in their view, are essential to all religious faith and teaching.

This criticism may not in either case be deemed just; but, since it is honestly given, it is worthy of some consideration. I, for one, would readily admit that it would be better for THE INDEX, and better for radicalism generally, if the positive elements of radical thought were stated more clearly and frequently than they are. As a private correspondent says, "There are hundreds [who attend upon radical teaching] who are really hungering after something to satisfy a newly awakened inquiry." "If these waiting minds could be made to see that theology, however interwoven with religion, is not religion, but that this is something higher and more universal than all theology, the real cause of radicalism would, I cannot help thinking, be greatly advanced." But, while I would grant that the positive side of radical faith does not in general get adequate emphasis, at the same time I think our critics are to be reminded that what they complain of is not specially the sin of radicals, but is only one phase of a defect that is common to the great body of writers and talkers on religion.

To the first class of critics I would say that there seems to me to be very little of religion in any of the so-called religious newspapers. I find in them a good deal of theological debate, a good deal of personal controversy, a good deal of trivial detail concerning ecclesiastical matters, a good deal of captious criticism and carping discussion, a good deal of talk about religion, but very little that is really religious,—very little that is positively uplifting to the spiritual nature. If THE INDEX sins in this respect, it is a sinner, therefore, in a large company. The truth is, the writings that are in the profoundest sense positively religious, the writings that go to the essence of spiritual things, and to which we repair for spiritual nourishment and uplifting, are very rare. They do not often get into any weekly newspaper; they do not come at the bidding of even every Orthodox editor. But, rare as they are, a goodly portion of them, it will be found, have been written by the radicals of their time.

Moreover, the question of spiritual nutriment is very largely a question of difference of appetite. What is food for one may be poison to another. It will not do for those who find their spiritual food in the Orthodox Advance, or the Unitarian Christian Register, or the Baptist Examiner, to set up their dictum as to what is spiritual food for all, and to declare, because they are not fed spiritually by THE INDEX, therefore nobody can be. The very articles which seem to them only critical and destructive, are to others full of inspiration, comfort, and strength. What so disturbs their faith brings peace to many souls, in whom the old faith has already been disturbed and broken beyond repair. And this is not a matter of conjecture; it is a matter of knowledge, to which the correspondence of radical writers and speakers will bear testimony.

The other class of critics to whom I have referred think that radicalism is necessarily void of religiousness because it is ignorant of certain experiences which they believe are essential to religion. A writer of this class in Zion's Herald says:—

"The radical, whatever his endowments or attainments, must admit, we think, that the true, the devout believer is the subject of an experience he himself knows nothing of,—is inspired by some principle of interior life, giving elevation of spirit, loftiness of aim, persistency of purpose, and joyfulness and gladness of heart even in the midst of tribulations, to which he himself is an utter stranger."

"The radical" probably will not admit anything of the sort. Methodism is zealous, fervent, vigorous; it has many excellent qualities. But when this Methodist writer comes to speak of "interior life," of "elevation of spirit," "loftiness of aim," "persistency of purpose," "joyfulness and gladness of heart even in the midst of tribulations," radicalism certainly will not allow his arrogant claim for the superiority of his faith. Wonder, indeed, at the arrogance of the claim must almost give way to pity for the poverty of the faith which finds the chief significance of phrases like these in that kind of religious experience known as "conversion" in the popular theology. For when the writer goes on to prove his sweeping statements as to the spiritual defects of radicalism, it is this experience of "conversion" (and the state of mind which he supposes to follow it) which is the one "religious experience" of which radicals, as he says, can know nothing. But even in this statement he is wide of the truth. As a matter of fact, many radicals were once believers in Orthodoxy, and went regularly through the process of "conversion," and know experimentally all about it. And some of these persons say that they find a serenity, trust, and peace in their present views vastly above anything they have ever known before. But even granting that radicals must admit the charge that they know nothing about the religious experience of "conversion," if their capacity for "interior life," "loftiness of aim," "elevation of spirit," be called in question, they would rather rest their case (not to speak of personal character) on one such writing as Emerson's "Over-Soul," or Wasson's "All's Well," than on all the evidence for spirituality that "conversion" statistics can furnish. It should be remembered, too, that Mr. Wasson's rich poem of trust was written when he was stretched on a bed of sickness, racked with pain, while poverty and helplessness were staring him in the face. If the Evangelical mind could read such writings as these without feeling their wealth of spiritual insight, confidence, and joy, it would, before the religious judgment of the world, rather convict itself than them of the want of a lofty spiritual discernment.

ARROGANT CLAIMS.

I have received a long letter from an Evangelical clergyman who is, I doubt not, an honest and worthy man. The claims he makes, and the imputations he casts, are a thing so stereotyped that I prefer to answer them (for the half-dozen time) through THE INDEX rather than privately.

We radicals who are now in middle life are, in one respect, very differently situated from our predecessors. Many of us are in the second generation of radicalism, were brought up in it, and learned from it all the good we know. To impeach its usefulness and healthfulness is therefore, to us, like impeaching our fathers and mothers; to say that it is an unwholesome atmosphere is like telling a bird that the air is bad for his lungs, or a fish that he should of all things keep away from the water. These were our early influences; then when we came to work in the world we were taken up by the enthusiasm of the great reforms, and trained to whatever we know of self-devotion in those. Emerson and Parker, Garrison and Lucretia Mott, took us in hand; these were our teachers, their words were our bibles, their lives of generous example shamed our indolence. What were the "Acts of the Apostles" to us, compared with the acts of the abolitionists?

Now for a good clergyman to write to one thus trained that the whole thing is to turn, after all, upon the practical work done; but that the Christian churches do it nearly all, and that "the doing of the practical work of reforming the world is not characteristic of non-Christians as a class," as my friend writes,—this is very much as if, while a train of cars is in full progress, some one were to stand up and harangue the passengers on the extreme absurdity of trusting to locomotive engines as means of motion. For these mighty propelling forces that moved us were never for an instant recognized as anything but "non-Christian" by the Church, until their work was so far done that it became an object for the Church to borrow the glory of their good deeds.

I do not doubt the stainless character and public services of multitudes of the clergy; but in looking back upon the reforms of the last thirty years—Anti-Slavery, Woman's Rights, and the various efforts in regard to prison discipline, labor reform, and the rest—it is impossible not to see that they have been forced upon the Christian Church, instead of its taking the lead in them. I have been over this ground so lately that I will not here dwell on it; but in regard to the Anti-Slavery movement the fact is glaring. Not occasional clergymen, only, but the very heads of the Theological Seminaries long maintained the rightfulness of slavery. Professor Stuart of Andover wrote to Professor Fisk of another Theological Seminary that "slavery may exist without violating the Christian faith or the Church." President Fisk wrote back again—"this doctrine will stand, because it is Bible doctrine." Dr. Taylor of Yale College, the head of the theological department, instructed his pupils that, "if Jesus Christ were now on earth, he would, under certain circumstances, become a slaveholder." So plain was all this, that Albert Barnes finally made his powerful impeachment of the American Church, which yet only echoed what Garrison and other outcasts had pointed out long before. "The language of the ministry," said Mr. Barnes, "and the practice of church-members give such a sanction to this enormous evil as could be derived from no other source, and such as it is useless to convince the world of the evil. Against all this influence in the Church in favor of the system, how hopeless are all attempts against it; while yet no one can doubt that the Church of Christ in this land has power to revolutionize the whole public sentiment on this subject, and to hasten the hour when in the United States and their territories the last shackle of the slave must fall."

So clear is this that my good correspondent makes no claim to prove his assertion of the greater practical service of the Church in respect to any reform but that of temperance. Even here the facts are all against him in regard to the origin of the movement, as may be seen by the unwilling testimony of the same Albert Barnes, speaking of temperance:—

"The ministry hesitated long before they dared to use language such as would be understood. It became necessary to form a society out of the Church—though composed to a great extent of those who were professed friends of religion—to do what should have been done in it; to endeavor to act upon even church-members and ministers from abroad, and to create around them a public opinion which would induce them to take the decided stand which was necessary; and by degrees to bring the Church to the position where it should have been at the commencement. The work was arduous and long. The Church stood in the way of the progress of the cause, and still stands in the way. Mortifying and sad as it is, I hesitate not to say that, taking the country at large, in my judgment there is not so serious an obstacle to the entire success of the temperance reformation as the habits and opinions of ministers and members of the churches; and it is only by an extraordinary movement out of the Church that the deficiency is to be made up."

If there could be more explicit testimony than this, I am unable to conceive of it. What the influences were that produced this pressure from without the Church, may be seen in the fact that the first total abstinence tract with which I am acquainted was published by Judge Hertell, of New York, an avowed infidel, in 1818. The celebrated tract by Rev. Justin Edwards was published in 1825, and a friend of mine well remembers hearing in his boyhood the description given by Dr. Edwards of the bitter hostility he then encountered from his clerical brethren.

The philosophy of the thing seems to me clear enough. The clergy having been, as a rule, honestly absorbed in saving the souls of men, have left the leadership of practical reforms, very generally, to those outside the Church; or else have driven them outside by their resolute preference of the abstract gospel. In case of the temperance reform, the time when the clergy began to take the chief control of it was when the prohibitory law began to be agitated, twenty years ago. I was then a member of the Massachusetts State Temperance Committee, and I remember well how it seemed to me that the clergymen who flocked to the cause were not merely led to it by philanthropic zeal, but by a visible remnant of the old love of domination and stringent law. It even seemed to me, sometimes, that they were like Macaulay's Puritans who suppressed bear-baiting, not merely because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectator. I do not wish to undervalue the services of these good men, but I confess that the whole tone of Prohibitory Conventions often seems to me more in harmony with the seventeenth century than with the nineteenth.

I have no time to follow my friend into his general assertions that it is the characteristic of Christianity "to go for the great unwashed, undertaking on their behalf burdens that the polished, amiable representatives of unbelief will not so much as touch with the tip of their fingers." Whom he means by these dainty individuals I know not. If perchance it be the writers for THE INDEX, I can only say that my chief anxiety for most of them is lest they should wear themselves out, as Theodore Parker did before them, by trying to do the intellectual work of the age and its practical work at the same time.

CHRIST IN THE CONSTITUTION.

The National Association for effecting a religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States held its long and loudly heralded Convention, in New York, on the 28th and 27th of February. The place appropriately selected was the vast subterranean cave of the Cooper Union; the hour of assembling was, properly, the afternoon. There were in all five sessions; two on Wednesday, and on Thursday three. Notices of the meetings were sent to all the churches on the preceding Sunday, with a ticket inviting the minister to a seat on the platform which he might find convenient in case the hall was crowded, as it was sure to be. The flourish of trumpets was solemn. The call stated the objects of the Association, urged their importance, and printed the names of the governors, bishops, presidents, professors, and men of authority who gave it countenance.

Resolved to watch the proceedings carefully, I went to the opening session. The hall was perhaps one-fourth filled with hard-featured men and women evidently from the country round about, mostly clergymen and delegates, with a few score of the hangers-on who frequent the building. The platform was covered with chairs, at least one hundred, all empty. At no time were there more than ten men on the platform, including presiding officers and secretaries. The only well-known city clergyman present during the meetings was the elder Tyng, and he appeared but twice. The meeting was called to order more than half an hour after the appointed moment, and the business of collecting credentials occupied some time, apparently not because there were so many, but because it was difficult to account for their fewness. The audience of Wednesday evening was the largest, and that meeting was made interesting by the presence of some smart dissenters who made it manifest that the assemblage was not harmonious in sentiment. But such persons, finding nothing for their turn, and being threatened with the police if they did not keep quiet, remained thenceforth away.

The meetings were dull; no man of eminent name or of brilliant parts spoke. No letters from distinguished absentees were read. The statements were commonplace; the arguments were stale; the appeals were frigid. Those present generally showed assent to the positions taken, but without enthusiasm, hardly with earnestness. The resolutions being open to criticism, even from their favorers, were recommittees, the statement about the Bible as the "fountain of laws" being especially unsatisfactory. How the committee finally reported it, or whether it was finally reported at all, I cannot tell. The speakers, as much as they could, avoided the treacherous ground of theological dogmatism, and kept to the safer region of sentiment.

The reports were not encouraging. The Treasurer announced the receipts for the past year as being something more than four thousand dollars; the expenditures fell a trifle below the receipts. In regard to wealth (take comfort, dear Mr. Editor), it was sadly confessed that the opponents of the contemplated amendment have the advantage. Frequently feeling allusion was made to your terrible hundred thousand dollars, a sum that suggested the alliance of the opulent classes, the co-operation of the great merchants and financiers, and an organization as thorough as vast. The Rev. Jonathan Edwards, a speaker of great assurance and of high authority plainly, asserted with unblushing effrontery that the "Liberals" had in their employ, at a salary of fifteen thousand dollars, a foreign lecturer who was at that very moment going about the country inculcating atheism, and "un-Americanizing" the people. Who can it be? Dr. Buehner? I should have asked the question, had I not stood in fear of the policeman who sat two benches behind me. There were several matters I wanted to ask about,—among the rest, the contents of certain awful papers which the speaker said he had in his pocket ("which, pardon me, I do not mean to read"), containing proofs of most damnable machinations of infidelity to undermine the whole social fabric and plunge the country into moral anarchy. It was too horrible to speak of; a hint at the enormity was enough. The docile audience listened with wonderment, but made no sign of curiosity. I am afraid that, but for the policeman, I should have disturbed the meeting with unseemly mirth.

The afore-mentioned Jonathan Edwards made no secret of the intentions of the Association. He was tender of the Romanists and complaisant towards the Unitarians, one of whom, A. D. Mayo to wit, they entrapped; also to the Universalists, one of whom, Dr. A. A. Miner, entrapped them,—but the atheists found no mercy at his hands. He more than doubted whether an atheist could be a good citizen. He was sure that he ought not to be allowed to try. "Tolerate an atheist!" he said (I quote his very words); "there is nothing out of hell I would not tolerate as soon." He would permit atheists to live in a Christian community, but only as he would permit lunatics.

The presiding officer had a perfect right to exclude free discussion from the platform. The time belonged to the Convention, not to its foes. The advocates of the amendment called the meetings and had the floor. The malcontents must do the same. But some points, it appeared, were not open for debate at all anywhere. The Sabbath question, the continuance of the Bible in the schools, the marriage laws, and the obligation of the Christian oath, were indispensable. The taxation of ecclesiastical property, the appointment of chaplains, the setting apart of holidays, might be subjects of discussion; but these four things were primary—in respect of them no questioning was in order.

Two things plainly appeared at this grand Convention: first, that the movement* is intensely hostile to cultivated free thought; and second, that thus far it has no hold on the popular mind. The daily papers paid little heed to the Convention, reported the proceedings with curt brevity, and spoke contemptuously of the design of the Association. The public turned the cold shoulder to the demonstration. Nothing but the respectability of the names on its list of officers warranted so serious a feeling as wonder. This certainly does not prove the movement harmless or insignificant. The very heedlessness of the public may make it dangerous by and by. But it does indicate that, as yet, it has made no solid gains and that the weight of the popular sentiment is against it. I am confident, for my part, that, when the people think it worth considering, they will repudiate it with something akin to scorn. They certainly will, if future Conventions are like this last. A new set of managers must take the cause in hand,—men either more diplomatic or more earnest; else the cause is destined to an early and a mortifying end. Unless the six bishops appear in substantial presence, unless the governors and ex-governors take the field in person with their imposing array of dignitaries, lay and clerical, we shall suspect that they gave their names because they were afraid to refuse them, and staid away because they were ashamed to be seen. Their conspicuous absence from the New York conclave looked like either cowardice or insincerity. They might at least give the cause a respectable look. O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

A DEFENCE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—A letter signed "C. T. F.," in your paper of January 25, leads me to say something in defence of what is commonly recognized under the term "Public Worship."

I cannot forget that whatever I may say will be attributed by some ignorant or malicious person to professional interest. It may be said: "Mr. Voysey is a clergyman himself, and he lives by preaching and conducting public worship; and therefore he is interested in maintaining a practice so essential to his own livelihood." To this I can only reply that what I have to say about public worship is said and felt by hundreds and thousands of those who do not live by the practice, but who spend large sums of money to keep it up. It may therefore be quite forgotten that I am an interested speaker, being only a spokesman for those whose worldly interest would lead them to decry public worship, and thus to save themselves a heavy tax.

It is rightly acknowledged that the rational of public worship turns entirely upon the idea we may have of God. Nothing seems to me so absurd as to offer prayers or praises, or to raise the heart, to an imaginary Being who is supposed to be unintelligent or unsympathetic—to feel or to utter any "devotional" sentiment towards the sum-total of things under the name of God. I quite admire the sound sense and consistency of those who with this pantheistic conception of Deity refuse to take any part in offering prayers and praises to a Divine Being at all. If God be not self-conscious, how can he be conscious of us, or of our thoughts? To try to commune with such an one is worse folly than adorning the stars, or telling one's love to the woods and rocks and babbling brooks.

I also have a contempt for that wretched compromise between Orthodox prayer and no prayer at all, which consists in praying to oneself and invoking one's own spiritual energies, trying "to get steam up" and to work oneself into an exalted frame of mind,—and then calling that prayer!

It is a miserable subterfuge, quite unworthy of honest men who have any wits to call things by their right names. If all my prayers and praises are addressed to myself, I am certainly wasting my time and my breath, and I am a conscious fool for my pains. No; let us have one thing or the other—words addressed by intelligent beings to an Intelligent Being, conveying feelings which it is a relief to pour out into a sympathizing ear, or no pretence at praying at all; no sham praise by singing of hymns, or other device to mollify Mrs. Grundy or to let the timid convert down gently.

I have said enough, I hope, to show that I entirely admit the reasonableness of the objection to public worship and ministerial functions on the hypothesis of pantheism, or of God being unconscious.

It is because, and only because, I believe that God is intelligent and quite as self-conscious as I am, that I think it reasonable to behave towards him as to a father or friend. If he be self-conscious, he must be as sure of all that is not himself, and cognizant of me and my thoughts. On my part, I am conscious of myself and of him: I know that I feel trust and reverence and love for him; which would be the height of absurdity if he did not exist and did not know me, but which is entirely reasonable if he does.

Of course I have long outgrown the foolish notion of thinking to turn him from his will, and I would not dictate to him, if I could, in the smallest particular; but this abandonment of a childish folly rather heightens my love and trust, since it increases my reverence and, as it were, draws me nearer to him than I was before. I delight more than ever in his past and present dealings (as the supreme Ruler of the universe), and feel much more inclined than before to pour out these feelings of delight in some words or actions. The more elevated my conception of the Divine character and wisdom, the more I shall desire to commune with such a Being, if he be self-conscious and conscious of me.

Let no one imagine that religion is in any peril from the true lessons of science; they are the strongest witnesses of true religion. Religion is only dying out in the hearts of those who have adopted a conception of a Divine Being as entirely unsupported by science as that of the old Orthodox Creator. Science no more declares that God is not self-conscious than that God made the world in six days. So far as science discovers design, adaptation, intelligence in the universe, it is in the path which leads to a self-conscious God, if there be a God at all.

Now the advocates for public worship base their defence of it entirely on their conception of a self-conscious God. If that be true, their practice is logical and justifiable. Whatever childish folly may still inhere in the forms used, whatever vain repetitions may still be found as blemishes in their prayers and songs, the principle is a perfectly correct and natural one. They deal with God as with a living friend; for such they believe him to be. They unburden their souls of aching thoughts; they relieve their pent-up gratitude by songs of praise; they gratify their aspirations in the efforts to come into his presence. To all this we have only to add the social elements in man, the immensely augmented power which he derives from combination, and the question of public worship is solved. These men and women all feel alike about God, in that he is to them a dear father and faithful friend—a being not only with a mind of his own, but a heart also; and they find their greatest earthly delight in coming together to speak to him and to talk of all his wondrous works.

The exigencies of the service soon lead to the discovery that it is needful to have some one to regulate and conduct the outward forms; and hence arises the ministerial function, which is also combined with that of the preacher, who indirectly fosters those religious feelings which have brought the congregation together.

If public worship is to be done away with, you must first rid people of the belief in God; for only on the hypothesis of atheism, or its cognate pantheism, can the heart of man reasonably stifle the religious instincts which are so universal and against which science has not one word to say.

No doubt public worship, as still practised, is full of glaring faults which will in time give way before the enlightenment of this age; but man will have to be entirely re-made before it can disappear from the world in which he lives and thinks.

I am, very sincerely yours,
CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Feb. 13, 1873.

In a letter to his friends at home, an intelligent foreigner states that "when a great man dies in the United States, the first thing done is to propose a fine statue in his honor; next, to raise part of the necessary money; next, to forget to order any statue; and last, to wonder what became of the money." The remark shows close observation and clear judgment.—American Reporter.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

One thing will not do for all;
Each one take what he can carry,
Each one see where he will tarry,
And who stands that he don't fall!
GOETHE.

I DO NOT PROPOSE TO DEBATE with any whether they shall form their "League." I would have every one persuaded in his own mind, as I doubt not he already is persuaded in the bias of his nature. Happily, there is not only one way; there are many. And it does not follow, because one will not join himself to your organization, that therefore he is an idle looker-on. He does not "stand still and wait while the world moves;" rather he does not take hold and do the task you have set. It is not that he lacks "courage and fidelity;" nor that he is waiting for the "adhesion of multitudes." He has his own method for his own work. Is it right for you, dear friend, to foist an issue upon him? Is it for you to make up a case and demand his allegiance? True, there is left him the liberty of refusal; but still is he not under the ban of your implied censure? I see only that it belongs to you to state your case and draw to your side those whom it will attract. You, and they working your way, accomplish all that is possible for you, and all blessing rest upon and attend you! "Towards larger justice and higher civilization?" Certainly. But reserved to each is the privilege of private judgment as regards the "best means." He is false and has not the "courage of his opinions" if he turn aside to obey another's sense of duty. He must follow where his own enthusiasm leads. "Each one take what he can carry," and suffer every soul else to select his own burden and serve the universe as he can and must—is that not a good gospel?

[Most certainly; and nothing is further from our purpose than to "foist an issue" upon any one. The issue is here, to be met or not met. We simply believe and say that the American people should meet it; but we presume to "censure" nobody. It is enough to state our belief that a public duty now summons us to action.—Ed.]

THAT THERE IS A FAR-SPREAD discontent among the hired laboring-classes, no one with open eyes and ears will deny. Nor are the people soothed by the reflection that their brethren in foreign and older countries are worse off than themselves. Worse or better, is not the question. Their best is not satisfying. Nor is the complaint primarily that they are worked too many hours. Eight hours or ten; no matter which: the evil is that only a scant subsistence comes from their toil in either case. Less hours, they surmise, will in some way elevate them in the scale of being, and so open a path to better times. It is all very well for wise heads to offer salutary counsel, to speak of sober, industrious habits, of economy, and to point out that in this country all may acquire property, and get to be, if not rich, then well-to-do: all very well. But the people thus addressed know that there is a monster mistake in it all. The good advice is not needed, and the promise is delusive. The majority, the overwhelming majority, of hired laborers have no future but a hand-to-mouth living. Day in and day out; year in and year out: what a little circle hems in their existence! And the more you contrive to educate this people, the worse they are off. Knowledge brings ambition, converts your palace to a dungeon.

"Yawns the pit of the Dragon, Lit by rays from the Blast."

The worse they are off—unless they see also the ways and the means of improving their condition.

Now what shall truly wise men and women say to this state of affairs? "Social Incendiarism," is it? Recently, here in Boston, we have had the New England Labor Reform League holding a two-days session. If their discussions have not been all one could hope for, they have been instructive and full of interest to all who could overlook somewhat for the purpose of getting at the real meaning of their protest and aim. This League sets forth that the present property-system is founded in injustice. "Nothing can rightfully be held as property which is not the product of human labor." "The free use of land, as of air, is the natural and inalienable privilege of every human being." No one may "assume to hold or sell more than the improvements." "Wealth belongs to those who create it." This and much more for which I have no space. Says one of our (mis)leading daily journals, speaking of these "radical reformers": "They reiterate without cessation that the laws of property must be overthrown" (the reformers reply, "No; not overthrown, but made over until they are equitable and just"); "and that labor is entitled to its whole production."

The reformers ask, "If not, who is?" I incline to think that this last is a somewhat puzzling question. And as to the land business, how is it that we regard it as proper for one to claim and occupy more than he can cultivate and really occupy? It requires only the power to keep it, to give one man the right, on this same principle by which he holds now his hundred thousand acres, to possess the world. If the air could be bottled up and stowed away in an air-house, I suppose these same lawful-property men, having possession, would be willing to let it into our streets and houses at so much per foot; and had the practice descended to us an "immortal custom," doubtless we all, as good citizens, would not only cheerfully acquiesce, but be honestly ambitious ourselves of becoming proprietors of extensive air-houses. But the question would remain all the same as to whether air-monopoly fitted well into a wise and humane civilization. And certainly there would be "professional agitators"—is it because that profession is not as lucrative as some others, that it is so much despised?—ready and abounding with "most extreme and ultra propositions." Well, good sense is good sense, get at it how you will; and so in equity, I am free to confess, however, that I am no partisan of leagues, organized efforts, and the like. But I am interested in having them well reported, that is, not mis-reported in their aim and method; for there is an earnestness and intelligence underneath all this platform agitation that has got to be respected, ere society will prosper peaceably.

THE NEW ENGLAND REFORM LEAGUE in its recent sessions took upon itself the task of defending free speech, and furnished Mrs. Woodhull the opportunity of delivering in Boston the speech she had sometime ago arranged to give in Music Hall. They had engaged Tremont Temple, but the proprietors broke their agreement when they heard Mrs. Woodhull would attend. Another small hall was secured, and the "suppressed speech" was given, and Boston still lifts its head above the sea! Of Mrs. Woodhull it can fairly be said that she is a woman in earnest. I have heard no contrary opinions from all who listened to her; and she had the attention of some very competent judges, as the readers of THE INDEX would agree if I should call the list. Much of the prejudice against her is itself "vulgar," and I have heard far more "obscenity" uttered about her than ever escaped her lips. To say that she is often extravagant in speech, is to say what the majority of even very liberal people would affirm. But no one will say that she is firing shots at random out of sheer wantonness from a love of notoriety. She has a philosophy in which she believes desperately, and Garrison himself was not more determined to be heard.

YESTERDAY ONE MIGHT HAVE wished for a dozen pairs of ears. There were certainly many pulpit attractions. My own feet lead me to the hall of the 28th Society, where Samuel Johnson delivered a magnificent discourse on "Transcendentalism." That it should be published seemed to be a general exclamation at the close. I turned to the morning papers for their report and found that he had suffered well nigh as much as the labor reformers. Pity!

I SEE THAT DR. FULTON bore testimony against Mr. Murray's heresies, given in THE INDEX last week. Fulton seems to be about the only Orthodox preacher in Boston who now consistently "stands up for Jesus." This time however he had to come to the defence of Paul. To speak ill of the great apostle was to sneer at the whole doctrine of Christianity. Dr. Fulton mourned for the good old days when "the sainted Griffin won for Park Street Church the name of 'Hell-Fire Corner.'" Then there was "travail with souls and genuine conversion." But the old times will not return, Dr. Fulton. And we are all hastening on to the new.

DR. FREEMAN CLARKE summed up Unitarianism, and he found the result full of satisfaction. "Unitarians have not become a great denomination, with thousands of churches; not the great tree, but the little leaven which has changed the whole character of Orthodox teaching in the Northern and Eastern section of the country." He saw in the Roman Church "union without freedom;" in the Protestant Church "freedom without union," and looked for a true Catholic Church in which union and freedom would be united. "Unquestioning assent," said he, "is less pleasing to God than honest denial." One could infer from this, observing the modern tendency of men, that the pleasures of Delty for sometime to come are likely to have manifold increase.

MR. ALGER SPOKE YESTERDAY of "The Place of the Dramatic Art in Human Life." From the reports I gather a most favorable impression. Next Sunday he will treat of the moral character of the modern drama. He is reported as saying, "In regard to the great standing controversy between the Church and the theatre, that one reason of its existence is the direct antagonism of the spirit and ends of the dramatic and the ecclesiastical arts. The former regards life as a joy, and endeavors to add to its happiness; while the latter considers it but a penance, and acts and teaches accordingly. There is, therefore, an irreconcilable antagonism." Mr. Alger, in concluding, gave a decision on the merits of the controversy, by drawing a comparison between Pericles, "a king of men when men were kings," and a Roman Catholic saint; much in favor of the former.

Is in Wirklichkeit der Religionsunterricht der Krebschaden unserer Zeit? Beleuchtung und Widerlegung der von Dr. FRITZ SCHULTZE gegen Religiosität, Religionslehrer und Religionsunterricht erhobenen Vorwürfe und Beschuldigungen, von Dr. EDMUND SPIESS. (Is Religious Instruction in reality the Cancerous Evil of Our Time? An Examination and Refutation of the Reproaches and Charges which Dr. Fritz Schultze makes against Religion, Religious Teachers, and Religious Instruction, by Dr. Edmund Spiess.) Jena, 1873. 8vo pp. 30.

This is a caustic criticism of the pamphlet on the subject of religious instruction in the public schools, which was noticed in these columns some weeks ago (No. 162). Both authors are lecturers in the university at Jena. The substance of Dr. Schultze's essay first came before the public in the form of a speech made at the annual convention of the teachers of Thuringia which was held in Jena in October last. The speech made a great and favorable impression upon the teachers, and at the close thereof the president of the convention took occasion to thank the speaker officially for the "golden words" which he had uttered. Dr. Spiess tells us that the printed "Admonition" has been widely read and commented upon, both favorably and unfavorably. It was to be expected, of course, that such a tremendous arraignment of that which is given in the schools of Germany under the name of religious instruction would excite opposition in the ranks of the clergy. The plan for reform suggested by Dr. Schultze would naturally be considered by them tantamount to an invitation to commit, so far as the schools are concerned, religious hara-kiri. For what the ecclesiastic, of whatever name or denomination, can least endure the thought of, is rational education. The idea of having the years of childhood, when the mind is most receptive, slip by without getting the dogmas of his church woven into its very texture, is horrible to contemplate.

Religion taught upon the basis of Nature and history is of all things just the one he does not want. Instruction as to the laws of matter and of mind, real insight into the various phases of religious development, is to him an abomination. Knowledge, that is not neutralized and made of non-effect by unquestioning faith in the ecclesiastical plan of salvation, is to him the most dangerous of all human acquisitions, and this from the simple fact that it is fraught with peril to the ecclesiastical institution.

To a certain extent, at least, Dr. Spiess represents this feeling in the pamphlet before us. He denies the right of his colleague, who is a naturalist and a Darwinian, to utter a word in favor of religious instruction of any sort, and charges him with inconsequence that he does not make war upon all religion as such. The "monastic" theory of the universe is in his view essentially atheistic, or at least pantheistic, which is to him practically the same thing; and as such it is the utter negation of the constituent elements of all religion. After thus putting his opponent out of court, the critic, nevertheless, proceeds to argue with him; and on some minor points it must be conceded that he gains an easy victory. That there are contradictions in statement, at least, in Dr. Schultze's pamphlet it is not difficult to show. But in our judgment these contradictions lie upon the surface and do not touch the essence of the matter itself. The use of the Bible, for instance, as the basis of religious instruction in schools seemed to Dr. Schultze to be open to the very gravest objections from a moral point of view. What propriety could there be, he asked, in holding up to the German youth of to-day, as a pattern in morals, "a nomadic people whose interests scarcely went beyond cattle-raising, eating and drinking, sexual love and superstition,—a people like the ancient Hebrews, who were addicted to polygamy and the keeping of harems; among whom even human sacrifices were still offered; a people which was in every respect far beneath our present stage of development?"

"I know from my own experience (he said), that not only I but my fellow-scholars learned our first immoral views in regard to the sexual relations from the Bible. And almost every one has had the same experience. We came from our homes pure and free from all such notions; it was in the hour for religious instruction where we learned what we ought not yet to have known, where our attention was called to things that were wholly new to us, and which for that very reason powerfully excited our fancy and impelled us to filthiness in word and deed. Passages like Leviticus xviii., or 2 Samuel xvi. 21, or like the Song of Solomon, were read with zeal, and I know that as boys we were greatly astonished to find such smutty stories [Zoten], as we called them, in the Sacred Scriptures; that in connection with the Song of Solomon we used to laugh at the interpretation given in the headings, an interpretation which our unperverted understandings could not get out of the words, for we found nothing but a love-song in it—and, indeed, one of the most sensuous sort—just as the critical theology does to-day. Our respect for the book did not increase, but decreased, the more we became acquainted with it; not because we were immoral, but because in virtue of our domestic education we stood above the ancient Hebrews. And how utterly perverse it was in our teachers to warn us of vices which we knew nothing about, of which we had not the remotest idea! In connection with the interpretation of the prohibition of adultery, a word which for us had not as yet the least meaning, the vice, for example, which takes its name from what is related in Genesis xxxviii. was not merely hinted at, but held plainly before our eyes. We were cheerful active boys, who played with each other in the rough and tumble of the street and into whose heads such things had never entered. Now our eyes were suddenly opened; the thing seemed interesting to some; and when the insane asylums receive a large proportion of their inmates through this vice, I should not like to guarantee that the foolish instructions of the teachers in religion have not laid the foundation for subsequent mental and physical ruin." (pp. 25, 26.)

To this Dr. Spiess objects that the Catholics and others, who are not instructed in the Bible, are also acquainted with these things. There is no lack of opportunity to learn them, and, if some learn them in the way above suggested, it would be just as reasonable to wish to abolish fire because it sometimes burns down houses, as to desire to do away with Biblical instruction on that account. He then goes on to say:—

"This squeamishness in respect to the Bible is all the more striking the less particular men are accustomed to be on this point in regard to other books. We do not speak of the daily press or of novelistic literature, but rather of the Greek, Roman, and German classics, where there is certainly ground enough for similar apprehensions. And as a matter of fact Louis XIV. of France did cause the Greek and Roman classics to be edited by Huet and Bossuet in usum delphini (for the crown-prince or dauphin), who carefully expurgated and re-cast everything that was offensive and insidious; all the apparently improper remarks or allusions of Homer and Horace, of Nepos and Ovid, in Plato and Aristophanes, and the rest, fall under censure. But who now reads these authors in such mutilated editions? The sixty-four volumes of the Delphin edition are regarded as curiosities, but are nowhere used in schools. It is regarded as a wrong done to an author to cut up and botch his work. And yet this is what in our day men demand shall be done with the Bible, for the many reforms now-a-days cry out not for a selection and collection of Biblical sayings and stories, not for an anthology, but for a mutilation and alleged improvement of the sacred scriptures, that they may crowd the Bible first out of the school and then out of our homes."

It will be seen at once that this is a very cheap style of argument. If the classics were read as books written under the direct inspiration of God, as being a special revelation of the Divine will, infallible guides in everything that relates to the highest human interests, there would be some sense in comparing them as books of instruction with the Bible. What in the classics is immoral, the pupil may at least regard as such; but when men feasting with sin are represented as God's especial favorites in a book which is held up as divine, how shall the moral sense escape corruption?

It must not, however, be supposed that Dr. Spiess comes forward as the champion of religious instruction in the schools just as it is. He also is of the opinion that there is great room for improvement. Indeed, he says very clearly that, in order to improve it, a more direct activity of the Church will be necessary than is likely to be tolerated in the schools of the State. He therefore thinks it will be necessary to give this instruction under the immediate auspices of the Church and in another place, leaving the State to provide only for secular education. In short, in order to save the Church, he demands that it be separated from the State altogether and left to sustain itself without interference upon the voluntary principle. T. V.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY. By O. B. Frothingham. New York: David G. Francis, 17 Astor Place. 1873.

We cannot name a book that is more full of the new spirit, the best spirit of modern times, than this. It is not a "body of divinity," but rather the soul of it. It is not a philosophy, organized and organized; but rather the presence of meditative mind, playing about the highest problems and suggesting countless excursions of the understanding. It is not a manual of science; but it has the inspiration of the scientific spirit, creating a boundless reverence for the truth of things and restraining the tendency to settle down complacently in "the conceit of knowledge without the reality." It is not a poem; but it glows with the prismatic brilliancy of imagination, and touches every topic with the graceful pencil of an artist. In short, it is a book quite unique of its kind, sketching rather than formulating, intimating rather than demonstrating, grouping noble thoughts in a bouquet at the suggestion of an almost perfect taste rather than co-ordinating definite conclusions in a system rigidly reasoned out. Whoever has a stomach only for exhaustive discussions will be disappointed by it; it is not the purpose of the volume to deal with these. Yet there is criticism of surprising penetration, reflection of great subtlety, moral and spiritual insight of magnificent depth. Few thinkers in America have enjoyed larger opportunities than Mr. Frothingham for a wide and rich and varied culture, and no one has made more diligent use of them; but the harvest reaped appears in the general quality of his style and thought rather than in any concentration in special granaries. Abundance of nectar and ambrosia is here for Olympian palates; but hardly a "square meal" for the average man. For this reason we should anticipate that the Religion of Humanity will be a book delighted in by some and unappreciated by others. The beauty of it will charm and fascinate many, like a lovely landscape seen through ever-shifting and dissolving mists; but it will not serve as a guidebook to one who simply wants to find his way to the next town.

There are twelve chapters, on "Tendencies," "God," "Bible," "Christ," "Atonement," "Power of Moral Inspiration," "Providence," "The Moral Ideal," "Immortality," "The Education of Conscience," "The Soul of Good in Evil," "The Soul of Truth in Error." These allied topics are handled, not exactly as would be done by the born systemizer, but certainly as would be done by the man of large and trained intelligence whose whole being, moral and mental, is concentrated on the high aim of interpreting to this age its own restlessness, hunger, and thirst. The spirit of affirmation pervades every page, and vitalizes every sentence. This is pre-eminently a book of convictions. Although the sort of construction here essayed is precisely such as to elude the perception of the dogmatist, who knows no construction that is not as it were mechanical, no one whose thinking is dominated by the modern faith in Naturalism can fail to note the nous formatus, the effort to work organically, of which the book is a product. We sympathize both with the purpose and with the method of it. Life must indeed be rationalized in its facts, its laws, its ideals; and the task of rationalizing it can be accomplished in no other way than that here indicated. The great basis of all future religious thinking must be that of experience,—not construed in the somewhat narrow and technical fashion of those who, like Mill and Spencer, present themselves as the professed champions of "Experimentalism," but rather taken as embracing the totality of all that is real in external Nature and internal consciousness. To be frank, we do not believe that Mr. Frothingham's great aim can be fully realized very soon. Philosophy must be rationalized before religion can be; and we look upon philosophy as needing the most profound and absolute reform. Yet the method that must govern this reform of philosophy itself, the method of applying scientific principles of analysis and synthesis to the totality of human experience, is here foreshadowed. A fine intuition, anticipating by a quick flash the slower processes of an intelligence that knows precisely how it works, lights up many a paragraph which to most readers, we dare say, will seem difficultly comprehensible. How false are the judgments of the average reader on a book like this! A phrase or a sentence indicating incredulity as to the stock-tensets of theology will rivet his attention, alarm his fears, and utterly eclipse the general scope of the writer; and what is in its very warp and woof affirmative will be forthwith branded as "negative" and "destructive." This falsity of judgment we have so often had to note in the current criticisms of THE INDEX that we do not believe our friend will escape it. Nothing will seem constructive to the Christian that does not attempt to repair the ever-widening breaches in Christianity. There is no help for this. It is necessary now not to be anxious to win the reputation of architects. The new constructions of scientific thought resemble the old ones of dogmatic theology as little as a growing oak resembles a tombstone. We must be content with building noiselessly and unobtrusively, as the new sap of the cambium-layer builds fresh cells out of sight under the bark of the tree. It is enough to know that we do indeed build, and not destroy, notwithstanding the decomposition that goes on all the faster because of our work. If the spreading ivy, thrusting itself deeper and deeper between the old stones of the abbey, pries them slowly out of their place and reverses the toil of the ancient masons, none the less is the process one of life rather than of death. And he who fails to feel the truth of this in reading these noble pages is one of those who will contribute nothing to the final verdict of mankind upon their merit. F. E. A.

ARTICLE FIRST.—GENERAL CHARACTER OF MR. TYLOR'S WRITINGS.

To take note of facts without regard to what might have been, or could have been, or should have been, according to some scheme of imagination, or desire, or enthusiasm, is the sound and sure rule under which the researches of Mr. Tylor have been conducted, with a result in the highest degree gratifying to the strictly positive or scientific student. In the present volumes we have the larger and more important portion of a work the introductory portion of which was given to the public in 1865, in a volume on The Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization, the second edition of which appeared last year. In the three volumes, extending to nearly fourteen hundred octavo pages, and constituting a comprehensive survey of verified facts and generalizations pertaining to the early growth of the human mind, there are contained, in admirable completeness and order, results of ethnographic study the interest and significance of which can hardly be overstated. Facts such as Mr. Tylor has collected would constrain curious attention, and startle customary prepossessions, even if they came only as reports; but here they come so scrutinized, verified, confirmed, and arranged, as to compel the assent which is due to science firmly established, and to cut clear through the opinions and prejudices which have hidden from living men the true history of human nature. Not that Mr. Tylor treads the doubtful and difficult paths which ethnography opens out in so many directions, with undue confidence or the least dogmatic audacity; but that he so carefully, so fairly, so wisely discriminates what is evident from what is uncertain, and so candidly suggests open views where clear conclusions are impossible, as to make the strongest impression of scientific veracity, and also to afford to ordinary judgment the very best means of estimating facts and forming conclusions. He is never weary of recognizing the possible hypothesis which he does not himself accept; he recurs constantly to the explanation of the clear and simple principles which seem to him to be a general expression for the best known facts; and these facts themselves he never omits to set duly in order before the reader, in statements which are models of scientific clearness, accuracy, and completeness. Again and again he invokes that just comprehension, that large and fair consideration, that sympathetic appreciation, which are so rare a fruit of even high scientific training, and so nearly impossible a result of ordinary education unless in instances of emancipation wrought by unusual power and quality of mind. He never forgets, and never allows his reader to forget, that even among facts the most widely remote from those of present culture, and in the presence of generalizations offensive to the last degree to present opinion, science, which is but another name for truth, must see things exactly as Nature gave them; and speak of them with the gracious veracity with which, when they were her freshest and fairest results, Nature pronounced them very good. That Nature was at all right in liking her work, Mr. Tylor neither affirms nor denies; he only insists that investigation, to be fruitful of sound results, must be entirely appreciative, studying Aztec, or Algonquin, or Australian mind with a courtesy as deep and true as that of the creative energy which was content with these steps in the age-long development of man. The attitude may be embarrassing to minds held in the grasp of conviction that man was fearfully and horribly made, or unmade, in the savage and barbarous stages of culture—this Mr. Tylor does not deny; but with admirable calmness and candor he requires the student, in order to truth and sureness of study, to look as closely, as carefully, and with as keen an interest and as candid an appreciation, as if every lineament of the face of primitive man were wholly pleasing to modern feeling. Guarding himself with extreme care against sentiment of any kind, other than pure love of truth for its own sake, and assuming that study at least must pronounce anything good which contributes to exact knowledge, Mr. Tylor surveys the facts of remote human history and enumerates the rudimentary tendencies of the human mind, in a spirit which is singularly humane only because it is entirely scientific. Few readers, whatever their prepossessions of opinion, can follow this survey without learning to concede the fitness and necessity of a comprehensive and generous recognition of man, under all the circumstances of his existence, wholly apart from any view that may be taken of man's intellectual, ethical, or theological position. Of man as man, in the lowest as in the higher stages, Mr. Tylor writes with a fairness which has not merely scientific, but high moral and almost religious value. So conspicuous a merit deserves the most cordial acknowledgment. And with equal fairness Mr. Tylor takes care to bring into view, and to fully appreciate, special opinions, other than his own, which have been, or which might be, derived from the facts of any branch of his subject, and the existence of which necessarily modifies the degree of certainty with which he can affirm his own conclusions. What may be called scientific hesitation, the refusal of inquiry to permit even a high degree of probability to establish a conclusion in the face of a possible contrary judgment, is a conspicuous feature of Mr. Tylor's method, and one which will command for him the high respect of thoroughly scientific inquirers. And as is usual with investigators thus nicely faithful to pure science, concerned for truth and for nothing else, and expert in discovering and estimating facts, Mr. Tylor repeatedly proves the superior power of his method by touches of penetration, happy suggestion, and felicitous reconstruction, which add much to the completeness of his success in a difficult task. The application of his conclusions to current opinions, and especially their bearing upon popular theological views, a task which Mr. Tylor leaves entirely to whomsoever it may concern, will be anything but satisfactory to readers accustomed to identify their own notions with absolute truth, and to see no other divine revelation than that of their own theological and ecclesiastical traditions; but there can be few even among these who will not peruse these learned and candid pages with hearty satisfaction, and with admiration for the love of truth, the interest in man, and the scientific sagacity which they everywhere show; while to the true lover of science, who believes that the scientific spirit is the sure key of knowledge, and knowledge the only gate of progress, Mr. Tylor's labors will add another to the triumphs of positive truth over supposititious opinion.

The keel ploughs ten thousand leagues of ocean and leaves no trace of its deep-graven furrows. The chisel scars only a few inches on the face of a rock, but the story it has traced is read by a hundred generations. The eagle leaves no trace of his path, no memory of the place where he built his nest; but the patient mollusk has bored a little hole in the marble column of the temple of Serapis, and the monument of his labor outlasts the altar and the statue of the divinity.—Dr. Holmes.

WHO IS JUDGE STRONG?

The government of the United States was created by, and is supposed to act under, a written constitution and the general principles of justice and equity therein clearly expressed. It can coin money, borrow money, and tax to the extent of its necessities; but it cannot take private property for public use without just compensation, nor impair the obligation of contracts (the latter by inevitable implication). By an obvious principle of law and common sense, what it cannot do directly it cannot do indirectly.

In 1861, this government, then pressed by a terrible rebellion of slaveholders, felt obliged to exercise its power of borrowing money, taxation being too slow a process to satisfy its necessities. As security for the re-payment of the money it borrowed, it gave its notes payable either at a fixed time future with specified interest, or at no fixed time and without interest. In spite of the non-payment on demand of these latter notes, the certainty that they would be received for taxes and some other dues to the government, and the probability that they would ultimately be paid in coin, gave them more or less value as a currency, but did not keep them up to the standard of value marked by coin. In February, 1862, Congress, with a view to increase their value in relation to coin, passed what is called "the legal tender act," whereby all private creditors were obliged to receive these notes at their full face in satisfaction of debts, past or future. This was equivalent to an impairment of the obligation of all existing contracts, and indirectly to an assumption by the government of the power to debase the national coinage; that is, to unfix the value of money; whereas the constitution only gives it the power to fix. Hence the legal tender act was a palpable violation of the constitution; and Congress in committing this crime exercised the most pernicious prerogative of a despotic government.

The plea was "necessity;" "self-preservation." But there was no necessity. The resources of the loyal States were abundantly sufficient, and the war would cost no more if its expenses were assessed equitably on creditors and debtors, than if the former class were sacrificed, partly for the benefit of the latter and partly for the benefit of the government. A borrower who accepts his own notes as currency to be re-issued gains nothing by allowing them to depreciate, by refusing specie when demanded—which specie he can always command by paying sufficient interest—because he is obliged to pay in discount, or loss of purchasing power of the currency, whatever he saves in interest, and possibly more. Under the circumstances a high rate of interest was inevitable. The government avoided it nominally, but paid it really and to a vastly unnecessary extent, in the use of its own depreciated and fluctuating currency. The legal tender act was no more effective in replenishing the treasury, indeed it was less so, than an advance on the rate of interest of the government bonds would have been. What it did do was to victimize to a certain indefinite extent the creditors of existing contracts, as payments became due; and the government temporarily shared to a certain indefinite extent with the debtors in the plunder. But the government, in its implied power of honest self-preservation, plainly had the right to take for the public use, as it took men, any kind of property, of either creditor or debtor, on making "just compensation;" and such compensation could not have differed much from six per cent. government bonds at par equal to the gold value at the time of the property taken. Therefore there was no "necessity" of robbing creditors at all by the legal tender act.

This ill-starred act, this atrocious blunder, has been permitted to outlive all pretence or benefit to the government. Its sole effect as to contracts made since its passage is to give advantage to the shrewdest and most lucky speculator in any contract involving time, whether he be debtor or creditor.

But to return to the question about Judge Strong. Just before the present administration came into power in 1868, Chief Justice Chase and a majority of the Supreme Court had decided that the legal tender act was so far unconstitutional that a debt contracted prior to February 25, 1862, must be paid in "dollars," not promissory and depreciated "greenbacks." This appeared to make a speedy resumption of specie payments a necessity, and it was accordingly promised in the President's inaugural. But the voice of Wall Street (clink of dollars) was too potent to allow the promise to be performed. It was discovered that there were vacancies on the bench of the Supreme Court; and if these could be suitably filled, Judge Chase's decision could be reversed, and thus the millennium of gold-gamblers, cornerers, and sharp-bargainers could be indefinitely prolonged. It was done by finding two lawyers who were smart enough to argue the seal from the face of a bond, and who could be depended on for the still more difficult job of reversing with some show of argument the Chief Justice's almost self-evidently righteous decision. Their names were STRONG and BRADLEY.

How they performed their job, to the eternal disgrace of the bench they occupy, may be seen by reference to 12 Wallace's U. S. Reports, pages 529-570. Strong took the lead, and delivered "the opinion of the court." With pettifoggery worthy of a Tomba lawyer, this relic of the dark ages obfuscates a matter as plain as the eighth commandment of the decalogue, through twenty-six mortal pages.

This same William Strong is the U. S. Justice who, having argued and decided out of the Constitution the spirit of one of the most important commandments of Moses, is now calling national conventions to interpolate into it the God of Moses and the semi-God of Paul. Having judicially dethroned and beheaded honesty, he seeks politically to enthrone and establish religion by law. Have the followers of the Lamb made up their minds to rush into politics under the leadership of the fox?

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

The God-in-the-Constitution party held two meetings on Wednesday and three on Thursday, Feb. 26 and 27. The meetings were held solely on the mutual admiration plan, and were not in any sense intended for discussion. True, a few of the speakers set up men of straw and then demolished them, greatly to their self-glorification, amid the applause of their sainted bottle-holders. By a judicious distribution of cards, soliciting names as members, it was ascertained that four hundred and sixty-six persons residing in nineteen States and one Territory of this God-fearing nation wished their names enrolled. At no time did the entire number of persons in the hall exceed nine hundred. A baker's dozen of addresses were delivered: nothing new or startling was developed. The speeches were characterized by a want of logic, power of windy declamation, lack of information, and remarkable mis-statements; still, considering that the speakers were mostly of merely local reputation, one cannot feel surprised that they should fall to give lustre to their cause. I must compliment some of them for their powerful lungs; poor Forrest's roar would have seemed a mere whisper compared with their bellows. As a rule, the addresses were tempered with moderation and consideration; a little denunciation and black-guardism was indulged in as a tid-bit for the country members by those anxious to obtain commendatory applause. "The infidel organization at Toledo, of which THE INDEX is the organ," was well advertised by the speakers; so prepare for an increased subscription list. The only protest which was allowed a hearing was unfortunately inconsiderate, and I regretted its appearance; the Convention owed it to itself that it should have rebuked its Executive Committee for the disagreeable circumstance, instead of which it unanimously re-elected the offending members. Nothing was said or done that would be worth the space required to tell it in.

NEW YORK, Feb. 28, 1873.

A PROTEST AGAINST PERSECUTION.

1. Resolved, That the prosecution with the arrest and imprisonment some months since, in the name of the United States Government, of Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull and others associated with her, on the ground that they were sending obscene matter through the mails, is coming more and more to be seen, as time reveals its spring and animus, to be not what it professes,—to be inspired not primarily, if at all, by regard for purity and the interests of the public weal, but largely in a desire to accomplish covert ends, to check and muzzle freedom of speech, to divert the general attention from damaging facts affirmed to be undeniable, to screen flagrant guilt in eminent places from merited exposure; and in order to this, at whatever cost to silence, to harness, to crush out those who have made public the revelations.

2. Resolved, That in this view there are issues raised here that are vital to all, going far deeper than anything appertaining personally to Mrs. Woodhull, her doctrines or her character,—issues of right, of justice, of freedom, and of conscience,—matters too sacred to be surrendered under any pretext to power, too vitally essential for society to be permitted ever to be invaded or put in jeopardy.

3. Resolved, That, committing ourselves in no way to endorsement of Mrs. Woodhull in her opinions or her possible practice—raising no question of this, which we deem to be entirely irrelevant and foreign here—we enter in the name of humanity our emphatic protest against that spirit of intolerance and oppression that attempts to ravish away from her elemental rights, even those that belong to criminals,—that seeks by whatever method to crush her and throttle her utterance of what in the world of facts she asseverates to be the truth.

4. Resolved, That the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and the friends of Mr. Beecher who are fully cognizant of the facts, having, in presence of the charges brought with such circumstantial minuteness by Mrs. Woodhull, and apparently from the mouth of more than two or three witnesses, failed to make any even the briefest denial, he must stand, as thus far appears, convicted on the indictment; and he will be, unless such denial is promptly forth-coming, assuredly so held by an intelligent public. And we hereby earnestly remind Plymouth Church of Brooklyn not only, but the Congregational body and the Orthodox communion as well, that they also are involved and have some stake in this matter; and we emphatically ask them whether they can afford to bear the burden of this burning reproach, even though, to purge themselves, they must condemn and disown or depose the most eminent and popular preacher of the Orthodox faith in America.

A GENTLE REMONSTRANCE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Like good Dr. Bartol, I find myself in perfect sympathy "with whatever honest League may be a genuine working power for the practical ends proposed" by your earnest and vigorous journal; but, with Mr. Tailor, I am of opinion that the proposed organization is "destructive rather than constructive" in its intent and purpose,—thus serving rather to excite the bitterness of prejudice, and the antagonism of individuals whose acquiescence in, if not co-operation with, the movement toward a higher civilization might otherwise be confidently anticipated. Are not the most beneficent reforms (moral or political, social or religious) those which are accomplished with the least friction possible under the circumstances? And has the steady progress in the direction of "Free Religion" which the nineteenth century chronicles up to the present day, any element of discouragement to anticipate in the immediate future, that we should hasten to adopt the tactics of our adversaries, and make war upon those who are not prepared to see the world through our spectacles? Is there not danger, moreover, that in the collision of active hostilities we, who claim to be the special advocates of toleration and moderation, may be forced into an attitude not altogether consistent with our professions?

Very respectfully,
ALBERT WARREN KEISKY.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

SALEM, O., March 1, 1873.

MR. ABBOT:—

The Liberal Society of Salem, Ohio, has been favored with another series of Sunday lectures by Parker Pillsbury, which for ability, force, and brilliancy have seldom been equalled.

The following resolutions, passed at the close of Mr. Pillsbury's engagement, Sunday, Feb. 23, give evidence of the esteem in which he is held by the Society:—

Whereas, The pleasant and on our part profitable connection with Mr. Pillsbury is ended for the present,—

Resolved, That for the unswerving adherence to his own convictions of right and duty, and for the bold and able manner in which he has presented his ideas of truth, Mr. Pillsbury has our gratitude and our thanks.

Resolved, That to all societies and individuals who desire to have old superstitions and prejudices removed, and who wish to hear the most advanced ideas on all reformatory subjects, Mr. Pillsbury has our endorsement and recommendation.

M. R. ROBINSON, Pres.
M. V. BONSALE, Sec.

"The Primate in a recent letter to the Archdeacon of Canterbury expresses his surprise that the clergy generally have not used the 'Prayer for Fine Weather' prescribed in the Liturgy, and hopes that they will not neglect it in future. The publication of this letter has called forth others from some persons who contend that the recent extraordinary rain-fall is beneficial, not only making up for the drought of previous years, but acting as an efficient sanitary agent, as proved by the state of our national bill of health. The agriculturists retort that the destruction of the seed-grain now in the land must make prices rule very high in the coming year, and thus the clergy are placed in a curious dilemma—as to whether the prayer should be used or not. Both parties appear to have overlooked the fact that all our appeals to the Almighty should be accompanied by humble submission to his superior knowledge of what is for our good."

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at Twenty-Five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 142, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 38, Dey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. ALL MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

SERIALLY

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. ———'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

- 62.—Contains an Accident and some Conversation.
- 63.—Treats of the Vicarage and Farm-house; and of the Machinations of a Wicked Woman.
- 64.—Shows that a Pliable Disposition may be wrought upon to Good as well as Evil Purposes.
- 65.—Which only those Readers who have some knowledge of Human Nature will think at all Truthful or Probable.
- 66.—Wherein we get rid of Mrs. Franklin for Good and All.
- 67.—In which the Engagement between Ruth Gower and the Rev. George Bligh comes to a perfectly natural conclusion.
- 68.—Contains various matters, Reflective, Rural, and Metropolitain, and concludes at Southampton.
- 69.—New York again. And what Paul did and heard there.
- 70.—A "Cut Direct" and other Experiences, too various for particularization.
- 71.—Is as Desultory as the one preceding it, and therefore introduced without Specification.
- 72.—More Boarding-House and Bohemian Details; the latter involving their own Moral.
- 73.—A Loving Heart, self-portrayed; and News from England.
- 74.—A Character; the re-appearance of a Scoundrel, and still more of Journalism.
- 75.—Another Return and a new Enterprise. Charleston on an Historical Occasion.
- 76.—In which a former Acquaintance takes Paul into his confidence concerning his Domestic Infelicity.
- 77.—Might have had the same Title as Chapter 76.
- 78.—More talk of Secession, and the Sequel of Richard Sabin's Catastrophe.
- 79.—A Companion-Picture to what we have seen in Charleston, but on a larger Scale.
- 80.—Clears the way for the Next and Last.
- 81.—In which John Gower's Misfortunes and the Story come to an End together.

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleans the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.

THE PRESENT AGE.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL devoted to Religious, Political, and Social Reforms, Public Literature, and General Intelligence. An exponent of the Spiritualistic Philosophy; and an independent critic on all popular movements.

PROP. S. D. BURTON, Editors. COL. D. MORRIS FOX, Editor.

OFFICE OF PUBLICATION 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

By Mail, $3 00 for 12 Numbers, in Advance. $1 50 for 6 Numbers, in Advance.

All orders must be accompanied by P. O. Money Order, Registered Letter, or Bank Draft.

THE PRESENT AGE is worth the price we ask, but as popular taste seems to favor the custom of offering premiums, we have procured FOUR finely executed French Chromos, allegorically representing the "Four Seasons." They are exquisite specimens of art, and we guarantee every one sent to our subscribers shall be equal to the sample used by our canvassing agents. And we further promise that no delay shall occur in forwarding paper and premiums, immediately after receipt of the order.

"SPRING" is represented by a little blonde maiden, garlanded by a spray of morning glories, and surrounded by flowers of different kinds still growing and in full bloom.

"SUMMER" is a rosy little boy, scantily attired, who has strayed into the field, where he stands grasping with both hands the tall stalks of ripe grain, and surrounded by asters and other blossoms of richest colors. Joyousness is in every feature, and one almost wonders whether he is not rejoicing at having hid away from an anxious mamma.

"AUTUMN" is a little miss standing under a grape-vine, one shoe slipped off, and holding in her apron some clusters of ripe grapes. The picture is a favorite with all who possess it.

"WINTER" is peculiarly characteristic. It is again a little maid, this time warmly clad, standing near a denuded tree, feeding a bird with crumbs.

All these pictures are exquisitely finished and colored, and are sure to be popular with all who become possessed of them. They will be furnished, mounted, varnished, and postpaid, to annual subscribers for THE PRESENT AGE, as follows:

One year's subscription, and choice of any one of the chromos..... $3 00

One year's subscription, and choice of any two of the chromos..... 4 00

One year's subscription, and the four chromos..... 5 00

The pictures are worth the price of the subscription.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL!!

THE IMPROVED ($12) BECKWITH SEWING MACHINE, with new Braidings Foot, and many other important improvements, all complete, with Hemmer, Guide, Four Needles, &c., warranted two years—with care it will do your family sewing for a life-time. Nearly ten thousand of these machines have been sold the past season, which without the above improvements are giving universal satisfaction. We will show letters to any who may call, from disinterested purchasers, in which they state that they would not exchange ours for the best high-priced machine in the market. It makes the popular Elastic Loop Stitch, and closes its seam accurately, which renders it the strongest and best; yet when desired it can be unlocked at pleasure. This is the machine which Messrs. Orange Judd & Co., of the American Agriculturist, &c., use so many thousands of for premiums. Full directions given with every machine. If after having the machine 30 days it does not give perfect satisfaction, we will refund the $12 on return of machine less the Express charges, and take the risk of its being injured. All orders promptly filled on receipt of Post Office Order for $12; or if $3 are sent with your order to us, the balance can be paid to the Express Co., when you receive the machine. Terms to Agents liberal, but cash invariably for all machines when received. If any doubt our honor or our responsibility, we will cheerfully give the best city reference. Bring or send sample of any goods with which to test the machine.

THE SIMPLICITY, EASE, AND CERTAINTY with which it operates, as well as the uniform excellence of its work, throughout the entire range of Sewing including Stitching, Hemming, Felling, Tucking, Cording, Braiding, Quilting, Gathering and Sewing on, Oversewing, Embroidering on the Edge, and its Beautiful Button-Hole and Key-Hole Work, places it unquestionably FAR IN ADVANCE OF ANY OTHER SIMILAR INVENTION.

It is also the CHEAPEST, intrinsically, as well as the BEST, since it is really two MACHINES COMBINED in one (by a simple and beautiful mechanical arrangement never before accomplished by human ingenuity), making either the LOCK-STITCH or BUTTON-HOLE STITCH, as occasion may require. It is, at the same time, simple in construction, comparatively noiseless, and easily understood. The Feed is adjustable, the tensions uniform.

The Company and its Agents WARRANT EVERY MACHINE they sell to give ENTIRE SATISFACTION. In the States of Ohio and Indiana, and in the Southern tier of counties of Michigan, we want live, energetic men to take agencies. Liberal terms will be given. Apply to the Company's Office, 44 Madison Street, Toledo, Ohio—F. A. Wells, Manager. Applications for agencies for the balance of Michigan will be received at 225 Jefferson Avenue, Detroit—J. W. THE INDEX begins its fourth volume under the most flattering auspices. Steadily working for the religious emancipation and noblest culture of humanity at large, and more immediately of the American people, it has received from the liberal public a most generous support. The capital stock of the Index Association has been subscribed nearly to the full amount of One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The circulation of the paper has more than doubled within the past year. Influential friends have given their means and their co-operation to its cause. Many of the best writers both of America and England are constant contributors to its columns. The people welcome its words, grow daily more interested in its ideas, and become daily more actively participant in the great movement it represents. From all parts of the country a continual stream of letters pours in from the old and the young, from the rich and the poor, from the lettered and the illiterate, from men and from women alike, expressing the warmest sympathy and the profoundest interest in the work it is doing.

With all this encouragement to persevere in the great cause which thus appeals to the best hopes and purposes of the people, THE INDEX for the coming year will possess increased means of influence. It is doubled in size, and must soon be more than doubled in power. It will address itself more earnestly than ever to men and women of all grades of culture who desire to share the best life and thought of the age, and to impart it even to the indifferent, the superstitious, and the enslaved. It already wields a great influence, which must grow greater every day, as brave men and pure women flock to the standard it upholds.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX will be henceforth specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States, in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Mr. CONWAY and Mr. VOYSEY have kindly consented to furnish every week alternately a LONDON LETTER containing matters of general interest to radical readers.

A new LITERARY DEPARTMENT, embracing book notices and reviews by writers of the first excellence, will be specially acceptable to the readers of THE INDEX, and supply a want which has been keenly felt. Rev. THOMAS VICKERS, of Cincinnati, and Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, of New Haven, will write regularly for this department; and their names are a sufficient guarantee that it will be characterized by scholarship and ability.

Every issue of THE INDEX will also contain a Boston letter from Mr. SIDNEY H. MONSE, late editor of the RADICAL, whose EVENING NOTES will be found one of the most attractive features of the paper. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

NEW YORK OFFICE.

The New York Office of the Index Association has been removed to No. 86, Dey Street, ground floor, and is easy of access to any one in New York or its suburbs. Mr. E. F. DENSMORE, a young gentleman of liberal education, radical convictions, and excellent business ability, will have charge of the office, where all the publications of the Association will be kept constantly on sale, subscriptions and advertisements received, and all other business promptly attended to.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered. Send for circulars at once.

The names, with address in full, must be sent at the same time, accompanied with the money in each case. No orders will be filled if these conditions are not complied with.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order.

OF

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show, how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

ORGANIZE!

LIBERALS OF AMERICA!

The hour for action has arrived. The cause of freedom calls upon us to combine our strength, our zeal, our efforts. These are

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and sustained by the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or piously as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Let us boldly and with high purpose meet the duty of the hour. I submit to you the following

FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———. Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to those offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

Liberals! I pledge to you my undivided sympathies and most vigorous co-operation, both in THE INDEX and out of it, in this work of local and national organization. Let us begin at once to lay the foundations of a great national party of freedom, which shall demand the entire secularization of our municipal, state, and national government. Send to me promptly the list of officers of every Liberal League that may be formed, and a standing list of all such Leagues shall be kept in THE INDEX. Hence, then, to the great work of freeing America from the usurpations of the Church! Make his continent from ocean to ocean sacred to human liberty! Prove that you are worthy descendants of those whose wisdom and patriotism gave us a Constitution unclouded with superstition! Shake off your slumbers, and break the chains to which you have too long meekly submitted!

Manhood Religion.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

In a work on the Principles of Zoology, by Prof. Agassiz, there is a remarkable and interesting frontispiece intended, as the author says, to present at one view the distribution of the principal types of animals and the order of their successive appearance in creation, as well also the rank or grade which each maintains to the other and to all. The ingenious diagram instructs us that there have been four successive periods in the career of creation; that in the first there was the reign of fishes, in the second the reign of reptiles, in the third the reign of mammals, in the fourth the reign of man. And these various orders of animals, with their different genera and species, are ranked in the picture according to their natures, one above the other; and at the top or head of the line is placed the word MAN. He is the last creature to appear, but by no means the least. For through all the preceding stages of creation there seems to have been a preparing for him. The Creator, as we might say, was holding himself in reserve to do his best thing last, when all had been got ready for it. God, as the designer of this diagram would seem to intimate, approached his masterpiece gradually; and when air and earth and sea were in a favorable condition, and all the fauna and flora of the planet were excellently well arranged; when being's high gradations were piled to the point where completion lacked but another touch,—then the Author of all drew again and greatly on his infinite powers, and launched from the bosom of his own being his fairest, grandest, noblest work, and capped the climax of creation with MAN, "made in the image of his maker." Prof. Agassiz fittingly indicates the culmination of the Creator's work by placing at the apex of his diagram the symbol of royalty—a crown; which shows that man is the coronation of creation, the head and front of all the lower orders of animals.

Now, aside from all opinions for or against the Evolution theory, I confess I never look at this frontispiece without feeling a thrill of grateful pride. "What," I say, "do I then belong to this superior race of creatures—this race for which there was such an extended and patient and elaborate preparation, the whole creation groaning and travelling to deliver itself of its noblest ideal! And is my human nature so inherently great and worthy as to overtop the long line of other creatures which God has made, and to stand in the nearest and most distinguished relation to the nature of the Divine One! Is there no other name in that immense catalogue of names, whereof all the orders of animals are called, which has such a royal and kingly significance as the one applied to my own kind! Then, if this be so, let me become deeply sensible of it; let me know the height and depth of the riches of my own nature; let me test its noblest capacities; let me enter into the exercise of its fullest powers; let me strive to live even with its present and ever increasing opportunities; let me, in short, be nothing and do nothing unworthy of my superior nature, derogatory to my exalted name!"

This is the effect which a thoughtful study of the diagram I have referred to always produces upon me. And then I somehow profoundly feel that not only am I summoned by the voice of Nature or of God to be a MAN, but to make both my life and word an appeal to every human brother to be one also; to impress it upon myself, and in every way to impress it upon him, that there is no name so honorable for him or me to bear as this name of MAN—a name which signifies not alone a generic distinction, but which is full also of the grandest intellectual, moral, and spiritual significance.

And I renewedly have this feeling whenever I notice how many other names have been and still are considered to be both more desirable and respectable. It is natural for the unreflecting and the uncultivated to perceive the partial and the particular rather than the general and the universal, and to become more familiar with that which is local, sectional, and accidental than with that which is comprehensive and absolute. Hence they like names as well as ideas which signify the less instead of those which signify the greater. When men became so numerous that they broke up into tribes and nations, they began to be enamored of and to adhere to tribal and national appellations; they began to forget that they were men, and to remember only that they were Hindus and Egyptians and Jews and Greeks and Romans. "I am a Roman!" how proud the old Latins were to say that! "I am of the tribe of Israel and the seed of Abraham!" how arrogantly and scornfully the Jew would say that, especially in the hearing of other peoples! The Hindus and the Egyptians thought, as did the Hebrews, that their nation was the chosen nation of God, and their land the holy land of all others—each being proud of that which they had in particular rather than of that which they all had in common. In the times of Arthur, Charlemagne, and Richard the Lion-hearted, to be a knight was considered more honorable than to be a man. In Europe, to-day, a marquis, an earl, a lord, a count, a duke, a prince—all these names are regarded as titles of nobility, are envied and eagerly snatched at, while the mere name of man is not regarded as a noble title. In this country, even in this republic, there are certain distinctions made, certain deferences are given to local and accidental titles, which are not compatible with a true idea of the worth of man as man. There is a class here who are called "gentlemen," with simple reference to their social position, their family connection, and so forth; and another class who are called "common people," because of their unprivileged birth and training. Those who insist on making these artificial distinctions are not true republicans, they are not true radicals; for they say in effect that to be such a "gentleman" is more respectable than to be a man; not considering that to be a real gentleman is impossible except upon the natural, inherent, and broad qualities of manhood.

But it is not in the secular world alone that preference is given to other titles than that of man. In the Church, quite as much as in the world, false distinctions are insisted upon; local, sectional, artificial names are made to take the place of that crown of all names—MAN. It is not to make us respect ourselves, to have faith in ourselves, that the Church has tried; but to get us to despise ourselves, and to carry our faith wholly out of and away from ourselves. It is not to make men of us that the Church has tried, but to make of us sectarians and partisans, and zealots for creeds. "Be men, manly men!" but she has said to us, in tones harsh and discordant with denominational spite and controversy, "Be Romanists, be Protestants, be Episcopalians, be Presbyterians, be Baptists, be Methodists, be Unitarians, be Universalists!" No one of these branches of the Church has been willing that we should stand simply on our manhood, and cultivate that, and make the most of that, and be content with that. No one of them has been satisfied to let us adopt the natural religion of manliness, to let us go straight forward, aside from the sects and the parties, and, as their own Bible has it, "quit ourselves like men" upon the basis of genuine honesty, veracity, and fidelity. It is true that these different branches of the Church have sometimes named to us one name which they tacitly agreed together was the best of all names—Christian. But then, instead of allowing us (if we could) to adopt this noble name into a large and universal sense, and making it synonymous with a true and excellent manliness, they have straightway foliated upon it their own peculiar definitions and artificial limitations, and endeavored to pin us with it now to this and now to that specific set of dogmas. If we rejected the name altogether, they would not be satisfied; or if we adopted it in the sense of any one, then all the rest would say we were wrong. And yet, by logical implication, they all say to us that to be a Christian is better than to be a man, because (they would have us believe) to be a genuine, true man is not equal to being a Christian.

But from all other names I fall back with greatest satisfaction on that which God himself seems somehow to have given us. He did virtually say, "Let us make man in our own image." Somehow at least we came to be men; and the highest divine mandate which now sounds in our souls is to be men—whole-hearted, genuine, true, perfect men. By being nothing less, by being nothing more, shall we fulfil the design of creation. MAN is the universal word; it includes all others. It signifies not the less but the greater; not a part but the whole. It has no local or sectional or partisan significance whatever, but applies all round the circle of the race. It signifies qualities of character which are peculiar to no nation, no tribe, no community, no sect, but which underlie and inhere in humanity at large. To be able to say, in the fullest and truest sense of the word, "I am a MAN!" is to be able to claim the most royal and most noble title in the world.

But how shall we be able to say this? What are the traits of a man? What qualities must we cultivate in order that we may "quit ourselves like men"? I will so far presume as to enumerate some of the most important qualities of manhood.

And I say, first, if we would be men we must be firm. Stability is a prime essential of manhood. A building, to stand secure, must rest even and steady on its base. So, as men, we must be self-poised and equable. We must stand squarely on our feet, plumb with the perpendicular line of rectitude, upright and downright, with the solid basis of principle underneath us. The world swarms with people of unsteady conscience and feeble will. Morally and intellectually invertebrate so many are! Hence so few successful people in the world, so few armed with power to execute, so few contributors to the common weal, so few real benefactors. For all the use that we can see they put themselves to, or are capable of being put to, great crowds of people might as well not exist: they do but appear to cumber, not to serve; utter leave of absence from this human scene one would think the wise community might cheerfully grant them. A man is a skulking dog until he has made up his mind. A man is not a man until he becomes conscious of power, and flames with the purpose to exercise it. Ethically speaking, we are not cosmic atoms until we thrill with the perception of the significance of things, and will with mighty constancy in the direction of the highest uses. Therefore a weak, unsteady, pliant, yielding disposition is ruinous to true manliness. We can only command confidence—the confidence of ourselves in ourselves, and of others in us—by being steady and decided in our purpose, and holding on to our deliberate resolution with a grip as determined as fate. Observe, however, firmness is not obstinacy; is not stubbornness; is not wilfulness,—it is simply strength of character. The merely obstinate man has only the quality of a mule; the firm man has the quality of a rational being. The difference between a firm and an obstinate man is, that the firm man makes up his mind on reason, and on reason only he is willing to change it; but the obstinate man makes up his mind without reason, and so it is vain by reason to try to get him to alter it. Consider deliberately, weigh carefully, judge fairly, decide calmly; but, when you have decided, be thenceforth as adamant against the wind and wave of fickle, popular opinion. Resting on the firm basis of your upright manly will, resist all opposition and move steadily on serene in your consciousness of rectitude, unmoved in your purpose to follow and obey truth and right.

I say, in the second place, that if we would be men we must be brave. I do not mean mere physical bravery, that which comes of brawn and muscle, and brute strength—the bravery of the bully, the prize-fighter, the champion of the ring; or even that of the rough back-woodsman, the pioneer, the scout, the soldier, all inured to every species of physical hardship and danger: this sort of bravery may be very well in its way, and there is no need of deprecating it. But there is a bravery braver than this; as much nobler, grander, and better, as the soul is than the body. I mean moral bravery; the bravery which dares to do a good thing, which dares to speak a true word, which dares to stand by a just cause, in the face of whoever or whatever objects or opposes. "Go not to the council at Worms," said the elector of Saxony to Luther. "I will go to the council at Worms," said the reformer, "though there be as many devils in my way as there are tiles on the roofs of the houses!" That was an instance of moral bravery, and in it Luther showed his manliness. We must be brave enough to go or stay, to speak or be silent, to do or refrain from doing, at duty's bidding, without considering the probable consequences to ourselves. We must be brave enough to say YES when yes is right, and no when no is right. We must be brave enough to tell a friend his fault, and brave enough to let him tell us ours. We must be brave enough to keep out of debt, by denying those wants which society and not our need suggests, to live upon the resources of our own self-respecting personality, to stick to realities and avoid shams. We must be brave enough to keep our own company when none better can be found, to go our way alone when others will not walk with us towards wisdom, to make our own choice in thought and word and deed and life, without reference to what the conforming, aping, gregarious multitude will say or do. We must be brave enough to get over all fear of men, and to fear only fear itself; that fear which saps the virile energies of true manliness. In short, we must have courage to "dare do all that may become a man," remembering that "who dares do more is none."

I say, thirdly, if we would be men we must be true; that is, we must have that in us which will win men to trust us and put their faith in us. What a splendid quality is fidelity! How it rivets men together, barring out all suspicion and distrust, the irrefragable bond of noble friendship, high communion, frank and generous confederation! The absence of fidelity makes the cunning, wily, artful dodger, the low politician, the shirk, the sneak, the traitor. In its absence, associations of men are held together by ropes of sand; every man is made a police to suspect and watch every other man; mutual trust dies; faith in one another perishes. Unfaithfulness is infidelity; the only infidelity which society need fear or seek to restrain. If all men were true, true as steel; faithful, reliable, trustworthy—what a gain of time and ability, of patience and temper, would accrue, all which are now exhausted in providing for the unfaithfulness of faithless men! A true man—one who gives his word and doesn't take it back; who passes his promise and keeps it; who stands up behind his statements and makes them good; who clasps your hand with whole-heartedness; who looks into your eye with a sincere, direct, and unflinching gaze which says, "I mean all I say and nothing else,"—what a luxury, but alas what a rarity, is such a man! And yet such we must be, if we would fill up the measure of manhood. We must be so true that those who know us cannot doubt us, that they will consider our simple word as good as a sacrament, that they will trust us with anything they will trust with themselves, that our character will be to them sufficient pledge and explanation of our conduct under the most extraordinary and trying circumstances. We must be so true that insincerity and duplicity will shrink and hide away from us, and never dare to offer themselves to our harboring. We must be so true in principle and practice, that the habit of fidelity will seize upon and hold us to its unyielding rule, even when temptation is the strongest and opportunity the fullest and general morality in the community the most lax. A TRUE man, one who is true,—true to principle, true to conscience, true to truth, true to right, true in every place and time you can put him,—such a man is so noble as to command our respect and veneration, almost indeed our homage and worship.

I say once more, and lastly, if we would be men we must be gentle. A real gentleman is a man who is gentle; who has the quality, or that set of qualities, conspicuous in his character which we may denominate gentleness. A manly man has somewhat of the woman in him; if he has not, he may be respectable, but he cannot be lovable. A complete man must not only have strength of character in him,—decision, force, energy,—but he must also have a certain beauty of character, which mildness, sweetness, gentleness, and grace afford. He must be like the lion in his courage, and like the dove in his harmlessness. He must on occasion be as firm and unyielding as granite; and then again he must be meek and humble, and docile as a child. Heroic in his manliness must he be—saintly also. He must be able to dare and overcome and triumph; and yet his heart must be full of human kindness and tenderness, sympathy for the suffering, charity for the erring, forgiveness for his enemies. Sir Philip Sidney was a gallant knight, a brave gentleman, a most honorable man. He could dare to tell the impetuous and fiery Queen Elizabeth her faults. He could dare to face the furious blast of battle. But when, on the field of Zutphen, he had wielded his sword most valiantly and received his mortal hurt even in the act of fighting for his friends,—then when bleeding, faint, and dying, he could compassionate the misery of a poor private soldier and say, "Give him the water I asked for; he needs it more than I." Here was gentleness as well as courage; here was saintliness as well as heroism. Tender and true must we be as men—tender and true. The masculine element of strength must combine in us with the feminine element of grace. Dignity must mingle in our lives with modesty, firmness with gentleness, courage with mildness, power with sweetness. Then shall we be what will not only command respect, but win love. Then will come about in these latter days a nobler chivalry than ever the old time saw. Then will we have men brave and pure, strong and gentle; gallant knights in every good cause, with hearts open to the call of mercy, and with souls sensitive to the claims of beauty.

Now, O brothers! if you and I can be men after this fashion, what better can we be? Shall we not then indeed be fashioned in the image of the Highest we can conceive of; and shall not our manly fronts wear the seal and stamp of a god? To be a man in this sense is to shame the best "Christian" the world has ever seen; is fairly to pluck from that name the brightest crown it ever wore, and place it on the brow of MANHOOD. Let Jesus take his rank with men, and feel himself honored to be our brother-man. Model too, we grant, in some things. Yet when, in due time, we shall celebrate the complete coronation of only manly powers, him overtopped we certainly shall see, brightest and best as he was among the men of old.

Come, then, let us gird up our loins, be strong, and quit ourselves like MEN. Let us give place to no lower, as we can have no higher, ambition than to be, each one of us, "every inch A MAN!"

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OR

The gnawing agony that it was to sit there, waiting—waiting—thinking of her in his company! To be so alive to her beauty, so burningly desirous of her favor, and so heart-sickeningly conscious of his own frail hold upon it, which even this puppy had been able to loosen! To fancy a bright smile turned towards his fool's face, while only cold looks and averted glances were the reward of the faithful and earnest love which maddened at such miserable rivalry! To revolve, wearily, all the past, and to feel as if the future were a dreary blank without peace, rest, hope, or happiness! And to scorn himself for being there, incapable of shaking himself free in spite of his degradation, and cherishing a pitiful wish for the perpetuation of his own slavery!

At ten o'clock, the staircase and passage became fragrant with the odor of boiled tripe and onions, and, not long afterwards, Mills appeared with a general flavor of those edibles pervading him (he had previously fetched the beer), and resumed his hat and comforter for the purpose of departing homewards to his lodgings in Somers Town. He came to bid Paul an anxious good-night; or, if possible, to persuade him to give up his intention of staying till Kate's return. He was just remarking, for about the dozenth time, that it was very late for Miss Sabin to be out, and that he couldn't imagine what detained her, when they heard the tread of feet on the doorstep, followed by Kate's well-known, loud double-knock. Paul's heart gave one great leap at the summons, and then began throbbing rapidly, painfully.

Mills went to the door and opened it, without closing that of the back parlor. Paul heard Kate thanking him—and the voice of Mr. Milfin. Both seemed in very great spirits, especially Miss Sabin, who immediately began talking about the weather, the muddy walking, and the delightful evening she had enjoyed at Bloomsbury Square—Miss Milfin was such a dear, kind, old lady, and so pleased at her acceptance of the invitation insisted on her coming again, and so on. Was it really ten o'clock? She didn't think it had been half so late. Mr. Milfin must come in and see himself. Here a half-muttered communication from Mills (the purport of which Paul knew as well as if it had been shouted in his ear) produced an "Oh, indeed!" some whispering, and a general adjournment to the front parlor.

Now Mills had taken the one candle, by its dismal light of which poor Paul had been brooding, to show the arrivals in; so that ill-used young man was left in partial darkness, listening to Kate's prattle, as she untied her bonnet strings and removed the warm shawl, the unauthorized appropriation of which had provoked Tib's objection. The door between the roof being wide open, he did not miss a syllable. I turned sick with passion at the sound of his voice.

Presently, indeed almost immediately, it came to him, bringing the light and leaving it. Milfin to the society of Mills. She knew was there, of course, but started at his pale face and haggard air, as he stood leaning against tall, old-fashioned chimney piece, in which fire had long gone out, though it was a chilly night in November.

"Why, Paul, I should never have thought your waiting here all this time—" she was ginning with a loud affectation of unconcern, cordiality, when Paul sprang forwards and laid her by the hand, which he squeezed so un-fully that her accent changed to one of resentment and alarm, as she tried to pluck it away from him.

"Listen!" he said. "I have something to say to you, and you shall hear me! You knew it was my birthday, and that I should come, yet you deliberately absent yourself and go out with that puppy, whom—"

"I shall do as I please!" interrupted Kate, red and struggling—he observed how handsome she looked, the whilst, and it angered him the more—"and I insist on your taking your arm away directly, sir, or I'll call Mills and—"

The sentence was not completed, for the person she would have named here appeared in the doorway, with almost as pale a face as Paul himself, and advanced into the room.

"Mr. Gower," he said in his most melodramatic manner, and raising himself on his tiptoes—he was a little fellow, a head shorter than Paul, but by no means ill-looking—"I will not permit this! You are detaining Miss Sabin against her consent and inclination!"

Paul sprang at him with an execration. Simultaneously Kate flung herself between them, entreating Paul to be quiet and ordering her champion to quit the room. There was a confused struggle, mainly on Paul's part to get at his rival. Mr. Mifflin ordinarily carried a little cane, which he now flourished, rather for effect than as an available weapon against the headlong onslaught of his adversary. It was torn from him, snapped in twain, and the fragments dashed in his face. The next moment, he found himself borne violently backwards, and he would infallibly have been precipitated head-first into the adjoining room, had he not come into collision with Mills, who was just then entering, and that so rudely that both went to the ground together. At which catastrophe the victor paused, being rather ashamed of his triumph.

Kate was flaming with indignation. "It was cowardly, brutal behavior," she said, "to one his inferior in strength—he wouldn't have dared to act so to his equal. His conduct was disgraceful! She would never speak to either of them again—never!"

"Come!" said Paul, still abashed at his recent violence, yet more exasperated at her taunts, and at her coupling him with Mifflin; "let him get up; I won't hit him again, only don't let him speak in that tone to me." And his fallen antagonist rose, together with Mills, both looking extremely discomfited.

"There's enough of this," Paul continued; "and we'd better understand each other for the future—all three of us. Mr. Mifflin, I want to know your position with respect to Miss Sabin. Has she encouraged—accepted your attentions?" A question one would think rather superfluous, only there are some truths which we are always unwilling to recognize. Wherefore Paul repeated it.

"To be sure she has," exclaimed a fresh arrival on the scene, as Tib entered, morally charging her sister, as it were, with fixed bayonet, while Mr. Mifflin walked up and down the room theatrically, without speaking. "And Kate, it serves you right, that it does, and I don't pity you one bit, and you ought to be ashamed of yourself! And Mills what do you stand there for staring like a stuck pig and mother thumping down stairs like madness to stop the noise!" Of which unpunctuated sentences Tib delivered herself with the shrillest rapidity, the fact announced in the last being corroborated by a subterranean pounding.

Mills put in his usual disclaimer of "T-Tibby!" while Paul felt that the scene was becoming ridiculous, and seized his hat. All the time, Kate had been reiterating her passionate declaration that she repudiated both suitors from henceforth; still Mifflin kept pacing up and down, with his arms folded. When Paul made towards the door, he paused.

"Stop!" said he; "since Miss Sabin won't answer you, I must. She has said that she could be happier with me than with you—I have that and more in writing! I demand if she can deny it? Let her make her election between us." He spoke in his usual stilted manner, yet like a gentleman.

Kate only repeated her objurgations, appearing, indeed, to great disadvantage. Again Tib and the knocking down stairs broke out clamorously. With a final glance at her sister, in which real feeling had banished affection, Mr. Mifflin turned on his heel as if to go, when she whom Paul loved sprang up, crying out not his Christian name, and ran after his rival to stop him.

Paul saw it and felt as if his heart had been torn out and stamped upon. He thought he should go mad. Rushing out—actuated by a simultaneous impulse to escape from the temptation to violence, and a wish to wrestle with an agony which he hated himself for feeling—he staggered and fell swooning in the passage. When consciousness returned, they were bathing his face with water, his rival, with a scared countenance, standing aloof, and the cause of all clinging to him, crying and protesting that she would be his—go with him—anything—if he would recover. He could not bear to look upon her.

CHAPTER XIII.

LOCKED OUT FOR THE NIGHT.

An hour or more subsequent to the events described in the preceding chapter, Paul Gower stood in the street, at the threshold of his grandfather's house, knocking for admission. As has been already intimated, it was not an uncommon predicament in the young man's experience, after an evening at Newnau Street, where he frequently lingered until he found it impossible to get home by eleven o'clock, at which hour the street-door was invariably locked, bolted, and barred, and the chain put up, although his arrival, five minutes later, might necessitate the unfastening of all these precautions. This rule had been so long in force that it amounted to a superstition of the most uncompromising character, especially affecting all the women of the household: it was akin to that which impels some British wives to sit up to any hour, rather than allow their husbands the unholy privilege of a latch-key. Of course Paul stood as much chance of obtaining that piece of ironmongery (which, in Mrs. Gower's opinion, opened the door to the seven deadly sins) as of the post of Pope or Grand Lama: even his grandfather had never possessed one; nor, during his entire married life, attempted such an outrage upon conjugal decency. Long ago, the old lady had, by the purest feminine logic, arrived at the conviction that, unless the street-door were locked, bolted, barred, and chained every night, at the hour appointed, she couldn't sleep in her bed—nay, that she should expect to be murdered in it, and the house robbed, or set on fire; so, for upwards of forty years, she had endured the alternative of having her rest and that of others disturbed, whenever her sons or grandson came home late—as young men will do even when brought up in religious families. It was tacitly understood that offenders in this respect were to perform a sort of quarantine before obtaining admission, to be commonly supplemented by a scolding in the morning; which punishments had come to be regarded as a matter of routine, involving little idea of amendment or change of conduct on either side. Paul, however (a poor relation, and kept very much alive to the fact), had hardly attained such indifference. Hence, a conscious criminal, he stands, near midnight, knocking at the door, and waiting until one of the two woman-servants shall come down, shivering in night-attire, and demand, in the combined accents of reproach and martyrdom: "Is that you, master Paul?" in form and manner provided, preliminary to letting him in.

It is a dull night and the wind blows hollowly down the dreary street, accompanied by fitful spits of rain; and overhead the murky heavens are black with the promise of more. The pot-boy at the public-house opposite is noisily putting up shutters. Two or three last customers are emerging from the swinging doors; one, drunk and obstreperous, is presently coaxed away by a companion, with whom he goes off staggering; the sound of their unsteady footsteps echoing in the distance. Paul listens to the sequential bolting and barring, watches the turning off of the gas, and the ascent of lights bedwards, and feels all the lonelier for the change. He knocks again, retires a few paces and gazes upwards at the windows.

No response. No dull illumination behind the blinds, indicative of the tardily-lighting candle; although he can almost cheat his senses with the impression that he discerns the flash of the preparatory match. The rain increases, falling fine and fast on his upturned countenance, and driving him close to the house for shelter. Ordinarily he would possess his soul with patience and wait; perhaps counting a hundred between the intervals of knocking. He has done this often—generally with a preposterous fancy that his admission depended upon his accomplishing the number deliberately, just as he set out to do. But he is past that, now, because very wretched.

The catastrophe at Newman Street had ended in his quitting the house, as he intended, forever, feeling utterly shipwrecked in hope and happiness. On recovering from the swoon into which overwrought emotion and the discovery of Kate's perfidy had precipitated him, he was too much beaten down to care to continue the miserable contest, or to answer her protestations. He was glad to get away. He had loved and worshipped that which never existed but in his own imagination. It was all over; he was alone in the world. So, faint and heart-sick, he departed with Mills and his rival; the latter of whom left them almost immediately, but not before he had expressed his regret at what had occurred, and shaken Paul by the hand. Mills bore him company the greater part of the way home, striving to give comfort; but Paul was not sorry to be relieved even of the task of listening to him. Wretched and exhausted, both in body and mind, he returned home. Let us rejoin him, as he stands waiting at the door.

A policeman, in shining oil-cloth cape, turns an adjacent corner and approaches, his heavy, measured tread sounding loudly on the wet flagstones. Paul knows what is coming, and, even in his dismal mood, is susceptible to annoyance. The constable perceives him as he passes, and, pausing at an arm's distance, directs a stream of light upon the hypothetical burglar, standing in the dark doorway, which brings that person's figure into startling relief, and casts monstrous fantastic shadows upon the house-front. In a climax of exasperation, Paul seizes the knocker and uses it loudly—desperately. The policeman moves on.

Another interval of five minutes' wind and rain and darkness, succeeded by a shuffling of feet in the passage, and a voice, apparently near the keyhole, making the usual inquiry.

"Yes, it's me, Becky. Open the door."

"Oh! Master Paul, I can't! Missie have been and took the key up stairs, to bed with her—under her pillow. You're locked out!"

"What?"

"She's been and done it, at last! She said it 'ud be a lesson to you. I thought I'd creep down stairs and tell you, for I couldn't bear to hear you knocking; but please don't say nothing about it. And, Master Paul—"

Master Paul, with a half-laugh of humiliation and half a good-night on his lips, was turning to depart, when the utterance of his name recalled him.

"You'd better go and sleep at a coffee-shop. And, excuse the liberty, but perhaps you've no money, and here's half-a-crown—I'll push it under the door—you can pay me whenever it's convenient."

Cordially thanking the warm-hearted housemaid, but rejecting her offer, Paul flung away from the spot, and strode down the street as if he would fain have turned his back on the fact of his application. He had reached the Euston Road before he paused to think whether he should go, and what do, to secure a lodging for the night. The prospect was not cheerful.

It had come on to rain heavily, steadily, with a vicious persistence, suggestive of a misanthropical intention on the part of the elements to be as disagreeable as possible. Paul could hardly see anything but water in the atmosphere, through which the houses loomed black and dismal, while the street lamps gleamed, red and dull, through a halo of mist, to be cheerlessly reflected in the puddles below. The mud lay thick in the roadway; the gutters were brawling channels of filthy water; and as bitter a north-east wind was abroad as ever searched out latent rheumatism in the bones of shivering humanity. Nor did the appearance of such pedestrians as were abroad tend to enliven the night. Now a belated wayfarer hurried past, under a sheltering umbrella, resonant to the rain-drops; or some homeless vagrant, drenched and shivering, his arms folded and his head bent downwards, slunk by. Once a wretched woman addressed Paul, with a joyless laugh and a sentence of street-slang. Vice and poverty had their exceptional representatives abroad, but little else was stirring. And this, Paul thought bitterly, was the night of his one-and-twentieth birth-day.

Becky's guess as to his impecuniosity was perfectly correct; he hadn't a penny in the world. His grandparents kept him very short in that respect, recognizing pocket-money no more than liberty, as indispensable to youthful existence. He would have been wiser if he had accepted the half-crown, and very likely thought so, as he stood in the rain, revolving his chances of obtaining shelter. His resources were limited to two places—Mills' lodgings, at Somers' Town, and those of Richard Sabin in Great James Street. Paul had once visited the former (in company with Kate and Tib, in the execution of a sort of picnic, involving the consumption of sausages, bread and butter, and porter, the entertainment being provided by the guests), but the distance and the hour disinclined him towards that expedient; while he supposed Sabin to be in the country, whither he had gone with his cousin, Harry Franklin, nearly a month ago. But there was an acquaintance of Dick's, who lived in the same building, had the run of his friend's apartments, and whose habits rendered it not unlikely that he might be stirring. Paul knew him well enough to warrant the attempt; so he set out incontinently.

Arriving at Great James Street, in a perfectly saturated condition, unexpected good luck awaited him; for the illumination of Sabin's windows proclaimed somebody's presence, and a knock at the street-door, supplemented by a few small pebbles, thrown at the panes, soon produced Richard himself, who came to the portal, yawning and very much unbuttoned, and gave Paul a hearty but surprised reception.

"Why, how pale you look!" was Dick's exclamation; "and as wet as if you'd just been flung out of the river. Come up-stairs and tell us what's the matter." And, so saying, he led the way to his sitting-room, where, notwithstanding the hour—now nearly one o'clock—a cheerful fire was blazing, while beneath the grate lay a pile of oyster-shells, the recent contents of which had evidently furnished a rather late supper for Sabin and his companion—the person already mentioned, a red-bearded artist from the lower floor, who was, if possible, a more inveterate Bohemian than Richard himself. "Get into these, drink off this, mix another and convince yourself that you're a warm-blooded animal." And Paul exchanged his soaked garments for a French blouse (which had been purchased by Dick in Paris, whither he not unfrequently went for a month or so), an old pair of trousers and other articles, disposed of a steaming glass of whiskey-and-water (although his head was hot and throbbing enough, despite his paleness, to render it, in one respect, a superfluous indulgence), and endeavored to follow the advice of his friend.

He easily succeeded in satisfying or rather diverting Sabin's curiosity: told him he wanted a night's lodging, and then inquired about his recent absence from town; of which Dick began talking with a freedom bred of his satisfaction at returning.

"I got back only a couple of hours ago," he said, "and was glad enough to have kissed the London pavement, dirty as it was. Not but what I had a decent holiday. But the country is awfully slow when one has too much of it. Wasn't there somebody who cried out for old London at fire-and-plague time in preference? Here's his health! I'm quite of his opinion."

"Well, you look all the better for it," answered the red-bearded artist; as was certainly the case, for Dick's face was ruddy with health, and, as he reclined in a low-backed arm-chair, with his feet in another, puffing away at the blackest of clay pipes, he appeared the impersonification of bachelor comfort. "And I don't half-believe you're in earnest, either."

"Just as you please. Only it's true, for all that. One field is as much like another as the sheep are—though a live mutton or a landscape painter may pretend to find a difference. So are the days, after one has exhausted the first agreeable sensation of having nothing to do, and nobody to poke you up for not doing it! Life becomes one great yawn of stereotyped despair of something turning up to interest you in your own existence: it's the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. You're in danger of fossilizing into an anachronism with your civilized fellow-creatures. I don't wonder that country people are all Tories: the faculty of believing that the world moves has died out of 'em, just as those fish you were romancing about,"—turning to his comrade—"in the what-d'y'-call-it cave of Kentucky, have lost their eyes, from living in perpetual darkness for so many generations. (I suppose it's a lie, but it'll do by way of illustration.) I don't wonder that they attach a preternatural importance to their own pigs and can never tell you that one is to be killed, or that a horse has cast his shoe, without a redundancy of detail which is absolutely maddening. If ever—"

"What cockney nonsense!" interrupted the other, who was country born. "Did you never read Charlotte Brontë or George Elliot?"

"No. I don't care about novels. When they're not bosh, excavated out of the author's own consciousness, they are seldom so amusing as the real, live men and women one may know any day—in town. I prefer using my own eyesight to other people's spectacles."

"Just as if your two-pence-a-half-penny worth of observation could compare with that of the writers I've mentioned!" The red-bearded artist was a great novel reader from sheer indolence.

"Perhaps not," yawned his friend; "only I like things at first hand. And, after all, you can't sample the sea in half-ounce bottles, or in lumps of prepared salt. It's better to have a good swim in it, if you want to know what it's like. Your novelists only take some fellow and put him through various kinds of sprouts, whereas in life there's as many heroes as characters. A book written on that plan would be worth reading."

"It would require Sam Weller's double-million magnifying gas microscope to do it. It's impossible."

"Very likely. And I'm not expecting it—only preferring fact to fiction. Just as I'd rather look at a real landscape—if I must look at one—than one of your tea-trays, old boy. I'll come down to printer's ink, perhaps, when I'm too old to relish flesh and blood, but not before."

"Well, but you're all wrong about country folks, to begin with. I suppose you read the newspapers?"

"Sometimes. Why?"

"Because they might have informed you that your notion that country people are only so many sheep, pasturing on beans and bacon, is all rubbish. Character is just as distinctly developed as in towns—perhaps more so, as lacking the attrition of the multitude. Look at the crimes, for instance. Whenever there occurs, I won't say a particularly atrocious murder—those are not peculiar to the provinces—but one displaying an extraordinary amount of crude diabolism in the planning, and absence of all compunction in the execution—and after—ten to one it happens in the country. Your clown may be a duller dog than your cockney, but for exceptional wickedness I'd back him against anything born within the sound of Bow-bells. That's more combustible than bricks and mortar—flares up quicker when the match is applied."

Sabin nodded an indolent assent and glanced at Paul, who was drinking spirits very freely, and not paying much regard to the conversation.

"The dullness you complain of," continued the other, whose tongue had been loosened by the same stimulant, and who loved talking, thinking he shone in it, "is inevitable; and the tendency to dilate on trifles is as common in town as in country, only cockneys have more to cackle about and less leisure. It's the same with the passions. 'Arry and Villikens have plenty of opportunities of letting off steam, but Fodge's chances are limited; hence it's no wonder if he explodes sometimes and breaks things. His life ordinarily runs in very narrow channels, and when a chasm does occur, in he goes, head foremost." Sabin yawned again. "But go on with your yarn, old fellow, and excuse interruptions."

"I was telling Mops here (who'd talk a dog's hind-leg off, if you'd let him)," resumed Dick, addressing Paul (Mops, be it observed, was a nickname bestowed upon the red-bearded artist in recognition of his capacity for drinking, or, as it is vulgarly termed, "mopping" up beer; and perhaps an allusion to the old pantomime equivalent ("mops and brooms") for inebriation, his real name being Humphries) "and whose defence of his brother bumptkins only amounts to this, they go mad sometimes out of ennui and bite one another, about the Franklins. However I'd pretty nearly finished, and if you'll look into that sketch-book it'll save me the trouble of talking. There's the whole history in the mug of the stepmother; and I've got her, sir, as neat as ninepence. You know the party, and will recognize the likeness. By the way, Harry takes it rather ill that we are not going to start for America immediately, but agrees to wait for our company."

Paul did as he was directed, Mops drawing his chair beside him and sharing the inspection. They soon found occasion to admire and laugh at the variety of sketches with which Richard had illustrated his country sojourn, and, allowing for a tendency to caricature, these afforded a pretty complete history of his recent occupations. There were village and farm-yard pictures, fishing and shooting scenes, and above all figures and faces; in short whatsoever of rural life, animate or inanimate, had struck the artist's fancy.

He received their compliments with tranquil satisfaction. "There," he said, "if they don't confirm what I've been saying, I'm an oyster. Most country faces have no outline to 'em—no clear-cut, sharp, decided lines. Their noses are nubbly, and their chins have as much individuality as potatoes. I'm not speaking of the poor devils who grind out their lives at the rate of ten shillings a week and become paupers, as a matter of course, when their backbones give out—they have angularities enough, God knows!—but of the better sort, the farmers. Look at that group, sketched at the Bear, in —, on market-day—a fifteen-penny ordinary—and wonder that I haven't drawn some of 'em on all-fours. I shouldn't have been surprised to see them put their fore-feet into the plates. Not one but looked as if he had systematically over-eaten himself for the last half-century. The young fellows are better; but there seems something in getting a living off land which has a tendency to reduce one's brains to the same consistency."

"Well, if you were as full as they are, and got up as early, you'd be hungry too."

"Hungry? They're never hungry! They can't be, on five meals a day, and two-thirds of them in the cannibalistic shape of swine's flesh. It's purely an animal indulgence, brought to a high state of perfection by hereditary practice. They think more of eating than any other class of people, and talk about it with an amount of interest which attaches to no other consideration—except, perhaps, money-getting; and if you want to see mammon worship in its most sordid, avowed, coarsest shape, you must go not on 'change, or in any of the conventional resorts, but among the green trees, purling streams, and toral ruralities of the country. A meal missed or delayed is a calamity, rather than risk which they'll undergo any amount of premature repletion. I believe their interest in pigs originates in a fellow-feeling. Tell them there are folks who get on very comfortably with a couple of meals a day and they'll disbelieve it, or despise them. It was Sidney Smith, I think, who reckoned up how many wagon-loads full of superfluous meat and drink he had consumed in the course of his life—if that were done for the British farmer, and the quantity for one generation piled up on top of the roads and villages of England, they'd be utterly obliterated!"

"Shows how much you know about it!" retorted Mr. Humphries, who was rather irritated at this stream of invective (which was not, indeed, very generous on Richard's part, seeing that he had been living on the hospitality of the class he abused, for the past month). "All you say applies only to the old school, and is monstrously exaggerated besides. The modern farmer bears no more resemblance to the animal you describe than to an ancient Briton. Except that he dines earlier, and has less time to bestow upon it, he's as temperate as any Manchester or Birmingham manufacturer, and not unlike one in his brisk, business-ways. He cultivates his farm exactly on the same principle that the other manages his factory by—the adoption of certain means to a certain end: they only differ in what each produces. He knows all about draining, soils, phosphates, and agricultural machinery and chemistry, breeds cattle according to the most profitable patterns, and takes a daily paper. And you can't tell his wife and family from any others of the well-to-do middle classes, except that they look healthier, ride a cock-horse, worship the landed gentry, and think double-Gloster and triple-X of themselves. Hullo! what a jolly-looking old boy!" The speaker suddenly broke off in admiration of a drawing of an elderly farmer on horseback, whose bluff, manly red face (Dick sometimes sketched in color), figure and costume would have made no bad model for the conventional representation of John Bull.

"That's my uncle, Miles Franklin. A hearty old buck enough, but with a soft spot about him somewhere, or he'd never have allowed himself to be picked up by the party on the next page. Turn over. There's the woman I was telling you about."

"Why, she looks like Dante, I'm hanged if she doesn't—only there's less forehead and more wrinkles. What a wretched countenance!"

"It's but a faint presentment of her disposition, I can assure you. Who's Dante?" Mops told him, almost in the words of the contemporaries of the great Italian poet, when that most sombre of visionaries passed along the streets of Ravenna.

"Seen hell, had he?" was Dick's comment. "Well, I'll back Mrs. F. for infusing as much of the element proper to that region into the lives of others as any of her sex—which is saying a good deal, too. Ugh! the catamaran! By Jove, how I have learned to detest her!"

"I wonder you stayed there so long, under the circumstances," retorted the other, not unnaturally.

"Do you?" said Sabin, a little annoyed. "Then I don't. The house doesn't belong to her, does it? That's just what mean and detestable people like—that their inclinations should be deferred to, without regard to others; they don't mind being hated so long as they get their own way. I go in for defying 'em. Besides, I was out of doors best part of the time, as you may see by the sketches."

"All right, old fellow; I was only joking." Mr. Humphries perceived that his companion was really nettled. "And what's this?" he continued, adding some praise of the sketch at which he was looking.

"That's a harvest-home supper in a barn, with yours truly in the chair. You should have heard some of the singing."

"Did you pick up anything?" inquired Mops, for Sabin had a great reputation as a vocalist, in Bohemian circles.

"I wish I could have got hold of a song about a highwayman, captured while asleep in a corn-field, and his horse trying to wake him; but the singer only knew part of it, and was too drunk to make that intelligible."

"It was Turpin," cried the novel-reader; "you'll find it in 'Rookwood.'"

"This was about one Mansell Somebody or other—I forget the name—a local party. They show you a house he lived in at —, and it's chronicled in the history of the town. I dare say the incident's related of half a dozen highwaymen besides. Tell it to my father and he'd swear it belonged to the famous Yorkshire thief, Nevison, whom he regards as most iniquitously defrauded of the reputation of the ride to York. A great stickler for the honor of the county is dad—fond of quoting some old bird who gets off no end of rignarole to prove it's the best shire in England.* But if you like, I'll sing you another song which has, at least, some rustic oddity to recommend it." And imitating the vernacular of the midland counties with a good deal of felicity and humor, Dick sang as follows:—

I've lived in a 'ood for a number of years,
With my dog and gun draw away sorrow and fears:
I've a swate little cottage, the roof it is secure,
If you look onderneath you'll find ground for the floor.

CHORUS—Ground for the floor! ground for the floor!
If you'll look onderneath you'll find ground for the floor!

My cottage is surrounded with brambles and thorns,
How awa-c is the noat of the birds in the morn!
I've a guinea in my pocket and plenty moor in stoer,
In my swate little cottage has got ground for the floor.

My bed's made of straw for my limbs to repose,
And for covering, I've but one sheet of clothes,
It's made of good ticken, and stitched up secure,
If you look onderneath you'll find ground for the floor.

As for grate or stove I've none, for my fire's on the ground,
And for cheers I have none, for toset myself down:
I've a three-legged stool, the chief of my stoer,
In my swate little cottage has got ground for the floor.

God bless my old feather, for he is dead and gone!
I hoap his soul* in heaven, and never may return:
He's left me all his riches he's heaped up in stoer,
And a swate little cottage has got ground for the floor.

When my life's spent and gone and death he dras near,
I 'ool leave to the better God beason and beer:
With the daasles above me, while time shall endure,
I'll lay snug in my coffin with ground for the floor.

This performance diverted the current of the night's conversation, or rather that of the morning, into a decidedly social and bacchanalian channel, whither it is not my intention to pursue it, especially as it led to the consumption of much more whiskey and water than was good for the partakers thereof. Mops sang: Richard sang again: Paul sang: they all sang together. I am sorry to say that the three young men became extremely intoxicated. Paul had gone through so much during the last three or four hours, that he was not proof against a temptation, preferring at once forgetfulness and exhilaration. But he paid a dear price for his folly. The indulgence, after getting wet through and being rough-dried in his damp under-clothing, superadding upon considerable mental excitement and bodily exhaustion, was too much for him. Before twelve hours had elapsed, he was stricken with a high fever.

INFIDELITY AT THE ANTIPODES.

[In answer to the inquiries of several readers of THE INDEX, the following article is reprinted from the Boston Investigator, in which it appeared a year or so ago, as an extract from the Dubuque Times.—T. W. R.]

Australia is determined to check Infidelity, and goes at the work in a way which speaks volumes for the earnestness and zeal of our antipodal Christian brethren. Mr. Wm. L. Jones, a sculptor and a member of the Royal Academy of Arts, lives in the town of Paramatta, sixteen miles from Sydney. Sometime in January last Mr. Jones was drawn into discussion with a preacher in that vicinity. In the course of the conversation, Mr. Jones asserted that the Bible was of no higher authority or divinity than any other ancient book, and was to be judged by the same civilized standard; that portions of it were no more fit for children to read than some portions of Shakespeare and other writers of former ages—the result of the difference in public sentiment then and now; that Moses was a liar and a robber, in that he falsified to Pharaoh, and stole all the jewelry he could get hold of from the Egyptians; that he, and David likewise, were "cruel wretches," in that both commanded general slaughter; the latter, not content to murder, ordering his victims to be placed alive under harrows, and chopped and sawed into pieces (2 Sam. xiii. 31, 1 Chron. xx. 3). All this was proved by the prosecution, on the evidence of the preacher with whom the conversation was held.

On the part of the defence, it was proved that Mr. Jones spoke of God "with great reverence," and declared Jesus Christ to be "the highest and purest character known in history." Evidence as to his good moral character was ruled out. The jury, without leaving their seats, returned a verdict of "guilty" of the crime of blasphemy. Mr. Jones was sentenced to two years' imprisonment at hard labor, and to pay a fine of two hundred pounds ($1,000). His hair has been cropped, he has been compelled to don the prison dress, and is now working out his sentence inside of the stone walls of the prison at Sydney.

It will be seen that our Australian friends are somewhat in advance of us in their methods of suppressing Infidelity. Here, although some of the States have laws upon their statute books to punish men for promulgating such blasphemous views as were expressed by Mr. Jones, they are, owing to a demoralized public sentiment and an unseemly weakness on the part of those appointed to administer the law, rarely enforced; the popular punishment being—as illustrated in the case of Mr. Underwood, lately of this city—a modified form of lynching, in the shape of rotten-egging. A move is now making, however, to secure the Constitutional recognition of "the Bible as the Supreme Authority of the Land"—a convention for the purpose having just closed at Monmouth, Illinois; and when that is accomplished, we shall be a step in advance of our Australian friends—for the Bible punishment for blasphemy is death.

THE MEANEST YET.—Some gentlemen were talking about meanness, when one said he knew a man on Lexington Avenue, who was the meanest man in New York.

"How mean is that?" asked a friend.

"Why he is so mean that he keeps a five-cent piece, with a string tied to it to give to beggars, and, when their backs are turned, he jerks it out of their pockets."

"Why, this man is so mean," continued the gentleman, "that he gave his children ten cents a piece the night before the Fourth of July; but during the night, when they were asleep, he went up stairs, took the money out of their clothes, and then whipped them in the morning for losing it!"

"Does he do anything else?"

"Yes; the other day I dined with him, and I noticed the poor little servant girl whistled gaily all the way up stairs with the dessert, and when I asked my generous friend what made her whistle so happily, he said: 'Why, I keep her whistling so she can't eat the raisins out of the cake!'"—St. Louis Globe.

SEND THEM TO CHURCH.—If you cater to the childish and unwholesome whims of your children, suffering them to absent themselves from church services, you are sowing within your own homes the wind, and you must reap the whirlwind. The Church of Christ is of divine origin, and neither day schools, nor Sunday Schools, nor home worship will supply its place; therefore, "Forget not the assembling of yourselves together."—Rev. Mr. Corbit, in the Church Journal.

BLESSING OF THE BELL.—The new spire of the Church of the Star of the Sea being now ready for the reception of the great bell which Father Cassidy has procured, it was solemnly blessed by Bishop Loughlin, at vespers, on last Sunday. The bishop was attended by Fathers Cassidy, Taaffe, O'Callaghan, McCarthy, etc. Amongst the sponsors were—Mr. James McGill, Mr. Herbert Gray, Mr. Hayacinthe Lamarche, Mr. Frank Lamberson, Judge Delmar, Thomas Foran, Mr. Edward J. Rorke, Mr. George W. Gibbons, Mr. Frank Turner, Mr. Ross McMahon, Dominick Roche, Captain Ferry, Mr. William J. Cody, Mr. John Roberts and Mr. John Hughes. This bell weighs 3,500 lbs.—Catholic Review.

RATTLING THE GATES.—Oh, that God's Spirit would strike harder to-night, and that each one of these citadels might be captured! Forward, ye troops of light! Wheel round the thundering field-pieces of God's law! Let the arrows of conviction shower the soul. Charge! Charge! Up! to the parapets with the standards of Immanuel! Surrender, O immortal woman! You want a new heart. Why not get it right away? Have you not postponed it long enough? I would with both hands lay bold and rattle the gates of your soul. For this night's work you and I must answer when the earth is burning and God is coming and the trumpet is sounding, and the song of the righteous shall rise into a perpetual anthem, and the wall of the wicked drop into the groan of unending pain.—Rev. Mr. Tahnage, of Brooklyn.

CHRIST THE CENTRE.—He who is tall enough to overlook the present boundaries that hamper and enchain Christian men has no trouble to see that a new tendency has set in toward Jesus Christ. In all the denominations he will see men and women whose faces are turned outward from sect centres, toward the Church's primal Head. These men are not organized but they are in organizing processes. He who draws will also organize. The Spirit that broods over the present chaos will bring out yet such generous unity and such high harmony as shall make the "morning stars sing again together, and all the sons of God shout for joy." We see the divine process as it goes on. We see the new brotherhood that is to be. We see the Church of the future whose base and bond is to be the constant and all-sufficient Christ. And we pray out of our soul, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly."—Living Christian (Providence, R. I.).

A RECENT MIRACLE.—At Nola, in the kingdom of Naples, on the 26th of April, 1872, a child of six years old was playing in the square in front of the railway station, and looking up at the marble statue of St. Felix, of Nola, Bishop and Martyr, the patron of the city, saw it turn its head and arm towards Vesuvius. In great fear that the statue would fall down and crush her, the child ran screaming to her mother who was employed in an adjoining rope-walk, and a crowd of persons soon collected. They saw no movement, but were terror-struck at seeing that the statue had turned completely round from the base upwards, and changed its position and attitude. The eruption took place immediately after, at Naples, and the inhabitants of Nola are convinced that the miracle was a warning of the event. The ecclesiastical authorities for a long time refused to interfere or take notice of it, but the inhabitants all desired an inquest, and the Bishop of Nola, Mgr. Formisano, at length consented. Sculptors, painters, masons, proprietors, and persons of every class were examined. All Nola was witness to the previous and actual position of the statue and its changed attitude. There could be no mistake as to the fact which is too patent for contradiction, and after an inquiry of six months the Bishop has published a decree as to the authenticity of the miracle, which is open to any one going to Nola (which is very near Naples) to verify for themselves. Not the slightest flaw in the marble exists, and all the experts have joined in declaring that by no human means could the alteration have been effected. A solemn Triduo was celebrated on the feast of the saint, and the devotion of the people was testified by the immense crowds which filled the church of the Poor Clares, where it took place, and by the conversion of a great number of public sinners and "Liberal" Catholics.—Irish World.

THE HIGHER VIEW.

BY JENNIE FERRINE.

If I saw not beyond the moment's pain,
Perceived no purpose working thro' the strife,
My pen should not be moved to write again
Of such a heartless mockery as life.

No wonder that the fretted souls of men
Sink to the level of their tollsome days;
The end and the beginning from their ken
Is hidden by life's dim and dusty ways.

Let for a moment from the toll-stained hands
And from the o'er-taxed brain the burden fall, Forgetting the imperative demands
That gain and labor make upon us all,

And through the upper regions of the soul
Moant to some height ideal, where one sees
From lofty peak the clouds beneath him roll,
And where the very shadows serve to please.

Then from the distance through the enchanted air
The sounds of life in harmony shall roll,— Sorrowing, rejoicing, and the voice of prayer,
United rising in a rhythmic whole;

And you shall see earth's mighty hosts advance
Through twilight unto such a shining land,
That you shall turn away your dazzled glance
Before a light too mighty to withstand.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

BUSINESS NOTICE.

To the Patrons and Friends of the Index:—

It was with much regret that we received the resignation of Mr. Abbot as editor of THE INDEX. The Board were well satisfied its promise to the public that no debt should be incurred by the Association could not be faithfully kept under Mr. Abbot's business management, he holding to the idea that the necessities of this year could be met by a loan in anticipation of next year's receipts. The Board differed with him in this respect as well as in many others wherein he was deemed impractical, and in separating the editorial and business management it acted upon its best judgment of what was right and absolutely necessary to keep THE INDEX alive. It was further considered that the editor's time was too valuable in his own particular department to be consumed by the very many details necessarily incumbent on the business management, all of which could be done as well by others now in the employ of the Association, without any increase of salaries, thereby relieving the editor from this annoyance and leaving him to devote his entire time to editorial work. This would enable the Board to reduce by $1,500 a much too high appropriation for paid contributors during the present year.

The Board never did interfere with Mr. Abbot's editorial management and never intended to do so; but when an editor claims that, as editor, he has the right to exclude from the advertising columns of the paper he edits, the authorized advertising rates (assented to by himself) as well as the name of the authorized Special and Advertising Agent, there should be some authority to control him, and when he refuses, as Mr. Abbot has done, to insert them after being ordered by resolution of the Board, a sharp control becomes a necessity, in so far as the business management is concerned.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Board, March 13, 1873, the following resolution was passed unanimously, Mr. Abbot consenting, and after it had lain over two months for full consideration:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted at the meeting on June 3d, 1872, relative to the powers of the editor, be amended so as to read as follows: F. E. Abbot is hereby appointed editor of THE INDEX, and shall have charge of the general business of the Association, subject to the direction of the Executive Committee and the Board.

The change in this resolution placed the editorial and business departments under the control of the Executive Committee as well as the Board, where before they had been only subject to the direction of the Board. The resolution separating these departments simply repeated the provisions of the above resolution.

When Mr. Stevens accepted the position of Acting Editor, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, there was certainly an implied obligation on his part that he would, while acting in his editorial capacity, remain neutral in this controversy. That portion of the Executive Committee who joined in the resolutions of which Mr. Abbot complains, regret that in the salutatory of the Acting Editor he has forgotten what seem to be the plain duties of his position.

The majority of the local board believe that when an association of individuals have contributed their means towards an enterprise which both their agreement and the law declare shall be managed by their duly elected representatives no one official can say that those means must be left to his uncontrolled management and discretion.

This question of "untrammelled editorial and managerial control of THE INDEX" is of more serious character than the opinion of the majority of the Board concerning Mr. Abbot's practical capacity as business manager. It should be settled now. We trust that it will be speedily determined by the Association.

The friends and patrons of THE INDEX can rest assured that so long as it is published under the management of the present Board of Directors its business will be conducted with strict integrity and its tone will not be lowered in any respect as compared with the past. We trust that the Board will soon be able to announce the name of another editor who will be a man of ability and culture, and whose heart and soul will be entirely devoted to the cause for which THE INDEX has so firmly stood in the past; and we believe that the friends of this cause have too much confidence in it to feel for a moment that any one man, by withdrawing his advocacy and support, can at all hinder its final success.

MARCH 22, 1873.

VALEDICTORY.

With the present number I cease to be editor of THE INDEX. The reasons of my forced retirement are as follows.

When the paper was first talked of in the summer of 1869, and I was asked to be its editor, I hesitated long before making up my mind to accept the offer. Journalism was something I knew nothing about by experience: it was not in my line; I had formed plans of study which it cost much to relinquish. But the great need of a weekly organ of Free Religion was very evident to me, and I did not feel at liberty to refuse when two gentlemen promised to pay all losses by the experiment for a year to the extent of $3000. I made only one condition—that I should be ABSOLUTELY FREE in the editorial conduct of the paper; and it was very soon afterwards agreed that I should have a veto-power in matters of business management. These two conditions were most faithfully observed, and I threw myself into the work without any fear of being hampered editorially or compromised by any of the equivocal practices which are usually regarded as essential to success in journalism. Much as I desired the success of the experiment, I did not want it by questionable means, and should have preferred to fail rather than stoop to the doubtful methods by which it is easy to buy an undeserved success. When the present Index Association took the paper, it was understood at the time that the same two conditions should be observed; otherwise I should not have continued to edit it. By a special vote of the Directors passed only three weeks after the transfer of the paper into their hands, the general business management of the Association was entrusted to me at a meeting of the Board which I called for the very purpose of dissipating all doubt on this point. A large proportion of the money raised had been contributed by persons at a distance, in spontaneous response to appeals made by me; and if any improper use had been made of the funds, they would justly have held me responsible. Many of my distant personal friends who knew nothing of the local friends of the paper had allowed their names to be connected with the Association through their confidence in me; and they could justly hold me to account for any transaction which might compromise them in any degree. Furthermore, I believed then, and believe now, that radicalism ought to be held strictly to the highest ideal rules of integrity; that business can be done profitably and prosperously without the necessity of having recourse to any doubtful expedients; and that the most brilliant success of the Association would be ruin in disguise, if purchased by departure from these ideal rules. These were the reasons, and not any love of business details or fondness for the exercise of power, which made me desire to be business manager. I felt it an absolute necessity to the work I was about that no whisper of reproach should ever be breathed against the perfect purity of our business management,—that no Book Concern or Credit Mobilier corruption should ever be allowed secretly to pave the way for our downfall, while I was all the while publicly summoning men to obey a higher law than that of the churches. The only way to be sure that no such disaster could happen to the cause I worked for, was to keep myself informed of the business and to have power to hold it up to the highest standard of honesty and equity. I have had no other reasons for wishing to be business manager, for in themselves business details are to me a nuisance and a bore.

Editorial freedom unrestricted by any control but that of my own conscience, and the general (not particular) direction of business matters, were thus the two conditions on which alone I consented first and can now consent to edit THE INDEX. If they are unreasonable, and not to be complied with, then I am content to seek other fields; but every man has an undoubted right to fix the terms on which he will work, if at all.

Hitherto these conditions have not seemed unreasonable to the Directors of the Index Association; but now, following bad counsels, a local quorum (a minority of the whole Board) think otherwise. They are under the hallucination that a paper can be edited by a Committee or by a Board, and that there is no necessity of picking carefully the right man and then giving him full power and responsibility while he is kept in office. They forget that doing business is not the primary purpose of this Association, but only a secondary one, a means to an end; namely, the furtherance of the great cause of Free Religion. They forget that the only sure way to a permanent success even in our business is to make THE INDEX intellectually the first paper of the land, and to make the Association morally the soundest institution of the land. If they are prepared to sacrifice either of these objects, they must prepare for failure total and complete.

At the meeting of the Directors on March 13th, the following proceedings took place.

"The following resolution, laid over from the regular meeting in January last to this meeting, came up for action (to wit):

Resolved, That the resolution adopted at the meeting on June 3d, 1872, relative to the powers of the editor, be amended so as to read as follows: F. E. Abbot is hereby appointed editor of THE INDEX; and shall have charge of the general business of the Association subject to the direction of the Executive Committee and the Board."

"Adopted."

"Mr. Cone offered the following:

Resolved, That on and after April 1st, 1873, the editorial and the business management of THE INDEX shall be entirely separate, and that neither shall be responsible for the acts of the other, but both be subject to the control of the Executive Committee and the Board.

"Mr. Butts offered an amendment that the date be March 20th, 1873, which was accepted by the mover.

"Mr. Bissell took the chair, and Mr. Abbot offered the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That further consideration of the above resolution be deferred, and said resolution be laid upon the table until a meeting of the full Board can be had upon special notice.

"Yeas and Nays were called for with the following result: Yeas, Abbot; Nays, Cone, Bateson, Butts, and Bissell.

"Lost."

"The resolution and first amendment were then adopted.

"Mr. Butts then offered the following:

Resolved, That P. H. Bateson be appointed business manager of this Association, to have charge of its affairs other than those connected with the editorial department, subject to the control of the Executive Committee and the Board.

"Adopted."

Feeling deeply my duty to the stockholders and the subscribers, I thought that a resolution which, if passed, was well understood by all present to involve the necessity of my retirement, ought not to be forced through by four only out of the nine Directors; and knowing as I did that the absent four (Messrs. Macomber, Higginson, Potter, and Hallowell) were opposed to its passage, I regret that no choice was left me but retirement. If I am to be subject to the dictation of Committees and Boards in my editorial utterances, it is not my calling to be an editor.

All that I have of strength, mental and physical, I have given for the past three years and more to THE INDEX. For the first two years I received no salary at all. For the third year I received a salary of $1000, and paid back into the treasury $1071, including the $416 which was my share of the purchase-money paid to the original proprietors. For part of the fourth year only have I received a salary adequate to the necessities of my family; and this is now cut off, leaving me poorer than when I came to the paper. I will not pretend indifference at such a time. I care, and care deeply, for the insidious peril that now threatens this child of my love; but I beg all my friends to rally round Mr. Stevens, whom I rejoice to leave in charge of THE INDEX. He is a true man, every inch; and I most cordially approve his course in remaining with it under the circumstances. In the crisis caused by my unexpected and forced retirement from the editorship, the Executive Committee (Messrs. Macomber, Cone, and Abbot) found it necessary to act promptly; otherwise the next regular issue of THE INDEX could not appear. At the urgent request of the Committee, Mr. Stevens consented for the present to be Acting Editor; and while he continues to act in this capacity, it is my earnest wish and hope that he shall have the fullest possible support from all who sympathize with his and my views as to the right conduct of the paper, in distinction from the views of those who would convert it into a mere business speculation.

And now, dear friends, farewell! You have most nobly stood by me, and I have done my utmost to stand by you. But even in your service I cannot submit to the control of a Board of Directors whose fundamental purposes are irreconcilable with my highest ideal of integrity and honor. Nothing is left me but to retire. If in any other than the editorial capacity I can still serve your true interests, I will most surely do so. All is not yet lost. And even if THE INDEX is carried away captive and diverted to other objects than those for which the money of the Association was originally raised, still the cause of truth, of right, of freedom, of pure and ennobling religion remains. To that let us all be faithful, come what may of papers and Associations,—aye, and of ourselves!

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE INDEX.

It is with unfeigned grief and pain that I refer you to another article in these columns, headed "Valedictory," where is to be found a statement of the occasion for what here follows.

Mr. Abbot's retirement from THE INDEX, and the circumstances compelling such a step, furnish me with a sufficient reason for no longer remaining in my present position. When he goes, in my eyes go also the central intellectual life and light of this journal, that which I think has given to it its chief power and influence as a great, brave, invincible organ and exponent of radical ideas and convictions; and without him I do not expect or hope that it will continue to be what it unquestionably has been with him. Moreover, the causes which have conspired to produce his banishment from the untrammelled editorial and managerial control of THE INDEX appear to me, if unchecked, to be pregnant with gravest perils to its very highest interests. Believing, as I most thoroughly do, after a close personal observation extending through six months, that Mr. Abbot's conduct of the paper, both as editor and business manager, has been characterized by the most distinguished integrity and unselfish devotion, and also in the main by eminent prudence, forethought, and sagacity,—and agreeing with him so nearly as I do in the spirit, methods, and aims of such conduct, and also disagreeing so largely with the manifest spirit, methods, and aims of those who now partially and would wholly control the Index Association and the paper it publishes,—I cannot, under these circumstances, entertain for a moment the thought of remaining permanently connected with THE INDEX in any capacity. Hence I have handed in my resignation as "Associate Editor and Business Agent."

At the earnest solicitation, however, of the Executive Committee of the Index Association, I have consented to remain as Acting Editor for the time being, until the full editorial functions of THE INDEX may be assumed by those who are willing and competent to exercise them. I need hardly say that I do even this with some hesitation and great diffidence, knowing full well that I cannot so much as temporarily prevent the great and terrible loss which accrues to the paper from the forced retirement of Mr. Abbot. At the most, I can only hope to bridge over if possible the interim between the known present and the unknown future, until wise or unwise counsels shall prevail to either save or sink THE INDEX. I most earnestly bespeak the generous co-operation and kind indulgence of all who can be patient in tribulation and hopeful of the final triumph of truth and right. May the Divine Spirit which every good man worships, and by which he seeks to be inspired, rule and overrule us to its own wise ends!

SPECIAL NOTICE.

THE INDEX appears late to its readers this week, and chief among the reasons for delay is briefly this. The article headed "Business Notice," in another column, was, in the night-time, and without my knowledge or consent, inserted in the "forms" after they had been "made up" by Mr. Abbot and sent to press. I resisted the attempt to thus improperly and illegally set aside the authority of the Acting Editor and that of a majority of the Executive Committee under which he temporarily acts. I resisted this, until Mr. Edward Bissell—one of the signers of that "Notice"—came to me and apologized for the manner in which that "Notice" was sought to be forced on the readers of THE INDEX, and requested of me its publication. Wishing to be fair even to those whom I honestly believe to be in the wrong, I consented to its publication. But I ask all the readers of THE INDEX to suspend their judgment on the various points made in that "Business Notice," until Mr. Abbot can fairly meet them with his own statements.

THE FETTER OF SCIENCE.

Even clergymen have now learned to speak with distrust of the "theologic method" and with respect of the "scientific method." But I think we must steadily remember that there is more in man than the scientific method yet knows how to reach; and the dogmatism of science may be just as shallow and hasty as that of theology. In the long anti-slavery contest, for instance, we had to make our battle not merely against the Doctors of Divinity, but against the men who claimed to teach science: Nott and Gliddon, even Agassiz, were constantly quoted against us, and the university lecture-room helped Garrison not much more than did the Church. It was the popular sympathy that always went in advance. So long as Canaan was cursed, it made no difference whether it was according to Scripture, or according to measurements of the facial angle. But when Uncle Tom's Cabin found readers, and slaveholders at the Bowery Theatre were shot down by fugitive slaves, amid thunders of applause,—then it was that both science and theology became subordinate matters. Since then, no doubt, science has been ready enough to recognize the humanity of the negro; but then so has theology.

In the present advance of science, there is, very properly, a constant effort to push it into the whole domain of history and sociology. But this takes us at once into vast fields, as unlike as possible to those which the microscope commands,—fields where the facts themselves are furnished by no trained corps of accurate observers, but are to be taken by wholesale from all sorts of travellers, letter-writers, and journalists, so that years of verification must be regained before even a substantial basis for a system can be laid. The very copiousness of facts presented by writers like Lubbock and Tylor, for instance, is dangerous, and their most important inferences may often depend upon the hasty assertions of men who have not sufficient accuracy of mind to report a dog-fight in the next street without introducing copious modifications of their own. Even Darwin, with his wonderful thoroughness and guarded moderation of statement, comes to this same difficulty when he goes beyond the facts of animal life, and discusses (rarely, to be sure) questions involving observations on human life and social phenomena. And we all notice, I think, in the modern school of English or French or German scientists, this over-confident step from the limited world of the laboratory into the vast and confused world of social observation.

Perhaps I can illustrate this better by an instance. In a long series of statements as to the lowest condition of man, Bächner has the following about the negro,—cited from Wilhelm Bischoff, who gave in Ausland for 1860 his impressions of the American Slave-States: "The genuine woolly-head, especially as he is not seldom found among the plantation-negroes, makes on the European who is not accustomed to such a sight an extremely disagreeable impression, which is aggravated by their character being, as a rule, in perfect correspondence with their ugly exterior. It would be difficult in Europe, especially in Germany, to find a stock that could even remotely be compared with this race. Except speech and form, these negroes have in them scarcely one mark of humanity; all their movements, their entire deportment, remind one rather of the brute, and they seem totally incapable of any higher culture," &c. "Almost all are thieves and liars; hence the evidence of a black has no validity in a court of justice. It is useless trouble to make them understand the wrong of this, because they are altogether ignorant of the word shame." [Man. 333.]

Now here is a matter which I ought personally to know something about; for it relates to a class of people among whom I lived for many months, under circumstances most favorable for the study of character,—being put under heavy bonds, as it were, from day to day, to observe them carefully and make no mistake in judgment. But I declare my belief that the facts he describes are not facts of race, but of condition, and that under favorable conditions and judicious treatment these people whom he describes as "having scarcely one mark of humanity" are, on the contrary, intensely human; that, instead of being incapable of higher culture, they respond readily to it; that whereas, as slaves, they may have been thieves and liars, they had, as soldiers, no more of these weaknesses than other soldiers; and that, as to the sense of shame, they are peculiarly and distinctly sensitive to it. What sort of an observer the man was may be seen from the fact that he throws the rejection of negro evidence upon the sufferers themselves instead of the dominant class; as reasonable a thing as the wolf's charges against the lamb. Wherever, the world over, it is desirable to make a subdued and defenceless class still more helpless, it is done by depriving them of the right to testify as to their own wrongs. But it is adding insult to injury to impeach character as well as crush liberty and life, on this ground.

So much for this particular case; but what is its further bearing? This, that if I find facts thus superficially recorded in one case, it may be the same in another; and so on through the whole book and all this class of books. When this is so, we have the scientific method and pretension, without a sufficient array of facts to afford the basis for science. And this seems the defect, at present, of a large class of books. Herbert Spencer, Galton, Buckle, and all that school of writers, seem to me to have great merit in shaking off the merely theologic system; but what they call a scientific system may sometimes involve as little discrimination and as much dogmatism. It seems therefore important that those who discard the fetich of theology should not deliver themselves wholly over to the newer fetich of science.

GOD IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

It is asserted by some who oppose the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools, that we who demand the complete secularization of the schools are bound by this principle to prohibit, not merely the Bible, but "God" in the public schools. They say that, if the State must recognize no religion, then it must recognize no God as well as no Bible; for God is the very cornerstone or the central idea of religion. But does not the State recognize and teach a God, when it permits text-books to be used in public schools containing selections from authors which instruct children to believe not only that there is a God, but that his attributes are Wisdom, Power, Benevolence, and so forth? Does not the principle of entire secularization of public schools, to the end that Church and State may be completely divorced and independent, demand that God, much more than the Bible, be prohibited in such schools? Expunge the name of "God" and all appellations of Deity from all songs and text-books, they cry, or you are not faithful to the logic which expels the Bible.

Again, as a matter of justice to atheists; what right have the theists or Christians, simply because they are in the majority, to teach theistic doctrines in public schools any more than atheistic? Is this not sectarianism in schools? If it be wrong for the majority to force the Bible upon children in public schools, why, they ask, is it not as great tyranny to force "God" upon them? Why should the child of the atheist be compelled in his Reader to read Chalmers on the "Benevolence of God;" or sing the "Star Spangled Banner," which tells us, "In God is our trust;" or sing America's—

"Our Father's God, to thee, Author of Liberty!" &c?

If the Bible is an offence to a Romanist, Rationalist, Infidel, or Jew, why may not lessons about a "God," a "Creator," a "Providence," be equally offensive to a disciple of Feuerbach who, it appears, believes in no God at all; believes that the word God "is only a name given to the ideal nature of man himself"? This is unjust to the atheist. He has rights which we are bound to respect. Do not override his conscience because you happen to be in the majority. Consult his feelings, humor his prejudices, be just to his sacred atheistic convictions, and remove God from the public schools, and thus make the public schools absolutely unreligious and unsectarian, as you profess to do. To this dreadful atheistic pit, they tell us, we are forced by the logic that begins by excluding the Bible from the public schools; a reductio ad absurdum, only to be escaped by abandoning the fourth demand of liberalism, and joining the American Bible Society. We have not yet made up our mind to do either.

However plausible the above reasoning may appear, it is clearly fallacious; and the fallacy lies in changing the second premise of the syllogism. We do, indeed, demand the complete secularization of the public schools. To that end we demand that the Bible as a book of religious service should be prohibited; and so we would prohibit any other book, a prayer-book or a dictionary, if it were only used as a book of religious worship. It is not the Bible in schools that we oppose, as our opponents assume, but religious services. If the Bible can be used as a text-book in Jewish history, as a reader or spell-book or any other text-book, merely for secular instruction, we have no objection to its use. It seems to us that this distinction between the use of the Bible as a text-book and its use as a book of religious worship has been overlooked by some of the readers and writers of THE INDEX. We are not called upon to defend Mr. Abbot; he is well able to defend himself. But we understand that he does not, in his fourth "demand," protest against the use of the Bible in schools solely and in good faith as a text-book of secular instruction; but he protests against its use "ostensibly" as a text-book, or, in other words, really and actually not as a text-book, but a book of religious worship.

It is, then, only to the use of the Bible in schools for religious services that we are opposed; because, when used as such, the Church founded on the Bible becomes, to a certain extent, a State Church, which we believe is contrary to the theory and the highest interests of our republican institutions. It follows from this that, as we have no objection to the use of the Bible in public schools as a book, not of religious worship, but of secular instruction, so we have no objection to the use of the names of the Deity in songs and readers for the same purpose. The object is not theological, but purely secular education.

If it be true that within the next thousand years some atheist is now and then offended at the bare names of the gods of the nations in school readers, he ought not to feel sorely aggrieved; nor would he, if he reflected that the lessons were selected not with reference to any doctrinal theistic or atheistic purpose, but solely with an eye to their literary, historical, or scientific value. When the Bible or "God" in the public schools is used for religious services, then it is a sign of the union of Church and State, and should be removed. But against the use of the Bible as a text-book for non-religious instruction, and against the use of the various names for the Supreme Being in the lessons of the public schools, not the most rigid advocate of the disunion of Church and State, it seems to us, can object.

W. H. S.

At a recent meeting of ministers in Boston, called to protest against the opening of the Public Library on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Fulton is reported by the Boston Journal as saying: "As the clergy stand, so stand the people, who look to them for their opinions on the observance of the Sabbath." In this case the wish was father to the thought. Dr. Fulton has mistaken the century in which he lives.

Dr. Buchner is usually regarded as a scientific man of high attainments. For this reason we were surprised to see, in a report of one of his recent lectures, a statement to the effect that "from one original cell has sprung every living thing, be it plant, fish, animal, or man." Surely the doctor cannot be ignorant that such minute organisms as the Foraminifera, which exhibit no distinct parts or organs, have no cellular structure at all. The cell is no longer the starting-point of biology, but rather unorganized protoplasm.

LET US BE FAIR.

It is pretty well known through the country that the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York recently refused the use of their large hall to our friend John Weiss, for the delivery of his lectures on Shakspeare. It is equally well known that the act called forth indignant comment from the press, both secular and religious; the more liberal Orthodox papers condemning it on the score of ungenerosity, and the less liberal, so far as we know, venturing no defence of it. The independent papers, as they call themselves, were furious in their contempt of the bigotry that marked the deed. The wits sharpened their pens and dipped them in the blackest ink; the rhetoricians let loose their most resounding sentences against the organized sectarianism that was as illogical as it was mean. Had the managers made inquiry into the religious unbeliefs of Froude? Had they cross-questioned Mrs. Siddons or Mark Twain? Had they satisfied themselves that Bret Harte and John Hay were sound on the main issue? Had they defined the articles by which the applicants for the honor of speaking in their fine building were to be tested? Had they agreed on the precise tint of azure admissible in a candidate who would discourse on spectrum analysis or recite the "Pied Piper of Hamelin"? These and similar pungent suggestions were ejaculated with all the glees of triumph.

Possibly the Young Christians have somewhere made reply to the criticism of their ill-wishers. If they have, it has obtained no publicity, and a word of defence in THE INDEX will, at all events, not be out of place.

The justification might be something like this. The Young Christians make it no concern of theirs to inquire into the religious views of the applicants for their hall. Their opinions are their own so long as they keep them to themselves. They may be Unitarians, rationalists, transcendentalists, materialists, infidels, atheists; while they hold their opinions as private individuals and not as public teachers, inquisition into them would be an impertinence. Mr. Froude is publicly known only as a historian, Mr. Harte as a man of letters, Mark Twain as a humorist, Mrs. Scott Siddons as a dramatic reader, Mr. Bellows as a reciter. The public are interested in them, are acquainted with them, in these capacities alone.

But Mr. Weiss is publicly known as a preacher of very heterodox opinions; one of the wittiest, most outspoken, most resolute of the men who assail the religious system which the Young Men's Christian Association was organized to maintain. So saturated is he with his convictions that they go with him wherever he goes, and are associated with him wherever he appears. Whatever subject he lectures on, he speaks from his own mind and betrays, unwittingly perhaps, his interior persuasions. We cannot be sure that, in writing about Shakspeare, he will not by some side remark or subtle implication, cast reproach on the beliefs we hold precious,—will not rank Shakspeare with the Bible, or raise a laugh at the expense of believers in the depravity of mankind. Were we morally certain that he would not commit such indiscretions, still his name, profession, calling, render him distasteful to us; we dislike and fear him. The more attractive he is, the more he would interest people in him; and interest in him might excite interest in his religious opinions, and the deadly work of perversion would be accomplished, indirectly, by our connivance. Religious teaching with Mr. Weiss is primary, criticism of Shakspeare is incidental. He lectures to put money into his pocket; he preaches to put unbelief into other men's minds; and therefore we feel justified in refusing to him, even for secular purposes, the use of a hall in our building which was erected purposely as a bulwark against minds like his.

The case, thus put, assumes a very different aspect from that presented by the critics of the Association. If it be objected that the ground taken is not solid as adamant, it may be replied that there is no solid ground anywhere, in the whole region of the debatable land; they that walk through a swampy country must be content to plant their feet on the spots that look firmest, taking their chances of mishap. The distinctions that are without a difference are the distinctions that excite the fiercest differences, and there is no wisdom in treating them lightly. In our judgment, the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association were justified in their action. We should think so had Mr. Weiss suffered in consequence of it. We can afford to say so, seeing that he was mightily helped by it.

LONDON LETTER.

EUROPEAN RADICALS ON AMERICAN REPUBLICANISM—THE MISTAKES AND CORRUPTIONS OF AMERICA A STUMBLING-BLOCK ABROAD—THE UNITED STATES NO LONGER A POLITICAL MODEL.

LONDON, Feb. 15, 1873.

THE INDEX is not a political journal; but I recognize in it a strong consciousness that the free religion it advocates is related immediately to the social and national well-being of America and to the political rights of mankind. There is a fraternity among truths, and they who embrace one are the more likely to embrace others so far as they are perceived. I feel, therefore, constrained to-day to call the attention of the thinkers whom THE INDEX represents to some phenomena of Europe which have long appealed for the consideration of Americans—are now especially appealing for that—and which have thus far been as unrecognized by them as the ghost which, overwhelming Hamlet, was mere vacancy to his mother.

Some years ago I was walking on the banks of the Neckar with Strauss, and he told me that he had originally been induced to publish his Leben Jesu by a perception that the people could never become politically free in an atmosphere of supernaturalism. The relation between these two terms I leave your readers to ponder. But I have before me at this moment Der alte und der neue Glaube, by that same pioneer of religious liberty, and I find constitutional monarchy defended in it against republicanism. What explains this phenomena? Why, simply that American politics have disgusted him. Better a hereditary occupant of the chief seat, though a dummy figure, than the quadrennial election of a (generally) third-rate president. The American "Rings," "Oakes Ames scandals," etc., are paraded on this side of the Atlantic with an attentiveness rarely accorded to other news from that quarter; and every newspaper in Europe has its comments upon the sharp practice of demanding of an arbitration-tribunal twice as much as would honestly cover the damages alone contemplated in the decision. The fact is that America whose grand example created European Republicanism, kindled the French Revolution—whose fires have remained potent to burn up every throne raised in France since '93—has become to the present revolution in Europe a reaction and a hindrance. This morning, we read that the new Republic of Spain, already too wise to repeat the Two-Chamber system of America, is being warned not to fall into our fictitious system of antiquarian and unequal States. I have reason to know that from all parts of Europe, republicans are writing letters to Figueras and Castelar, imploring them to beware of the American errors—the king in citizen's dress, called a president, and their electoral methods. So long as I have resided in Europe, I have never heard an educated republican referring with admiration to the American Congress; but on the contrary it is a common thing to hear our system extolled by monarchists.

Since the day when Jeremy Bentham warned the French Republicans against taking their model from America, on account of the monarchical features it had preserved, this skepticism concerning our institutions has been steadily increasing, until now we find that nearly every philosophic radical in Europe, Mill, Mazzini, Louis Blanc, Karl Blind, Etienne, Bagehot, Louis Buchner, Feuerbach, Freiligrath, and others, have reluctantly borne their testimony against the same, and in favor of the Swiss forms, with exception of the two chambers of Legislature which the latter has unfortunately preserved. Many of the eminent men I have named have stated their objections in papers or works which have commanded general attention in Europe, and have substantiated them with facts and arguments. These facts and arguments have as yet met with no reply from America; no American thinker or statesman has as yet given to the world a defence of the constitutional features assailed. The result has been that, in the tribunal of advanced political thought in Europe, the verdict has gone against the organic forms of the United States by default. If our country had shown in the outcome and working of its political institutions results that might be quoted as arguments, the silence of its political thinkers might have been dignified and just; but no one who has noted the scandals of the past and of the present associated with legislation at Washington, Albany, or other capitals, or with our presidential elections, can say that the arguments of European critics have been levelled against a success so palpable as to require no justification or defence.

The practical result of these unanswered criticisms by distinguished and resolute European republicans has been, I repeat, a situation which, as it seems to me, no American can regard without shame. In England, we have seen one of the most important republican associations distinctly disavowing any inclination towards copying the double legislature and the presidency which have afflicted the United States, and proposing to abolish the throne and the House of Lords without putting either legate or president in their place. In Germany, the Junkers are quoting the "necessity," as they like to call it, which America has found for an Upper House, against those who would abolish the relic of feudalism represented in their Herrenhaus. The English lords similarly defend themselves in the names of the founders of the American Republic. In France, the use that is being made of the United States is particularly distressing. There the republican party is being fought by a party of reaction, ranged under the American flag. Circumstances have compelled M. Thiers and other old and ingrained monarchists, to espouse for the time what is called the Republic,—a Republic under which suppressions of the right of printing, and of assemblage, and massacres of honest men, are taking place, equally odious with those which have dyed with historic infamy the reeking hand of Napoleon III. All Europe sees through the thin disguise of these monarchists, who are trying to crush the new-born Republic of Spain with one hand, while with the other they are trying to secure the final defeat of the Left by establishing an Upper Chamber to paralyze them. And this they are doing with treacherous appeals to the example of the United States! When such a man as M. Dufaure is engaged in betraying Republicanism by handing to the country a proposition for stereotyping the power of a usurping majority, insidiously wrapped up in references to the American Senate, it surely is time for the friends of freedom in the United States to revise their institutions. The French Republicans cannot forget that it was out of a government substantially modelled upon that of the United States that there sprang the cruel dynasty from which, after twenty cruel years, they have been rescued—barely alive. What must they think when they find the example of America being used to rebuild for them preliminary steps descending toward the same abyss? "Whether," writes the president of the Left to me, "whether we shall know how to turn to account the lesson we have repeatedly received, remains to be seen. I hope it will be so. Certain it is that now-a-days many are they in the Republican party who consider the presidential office as a mere stepping-stone to ascend the throne. If others have some doubt left as to the necessity, both of a President and a Second Chamber, it is because they are under the impression that that system works well in the United States. To correct such an error is to do good service to the cause of republican institutions."

Now I do not ask thinking Americans to agree with M. Blanc, and the other European radicals to whom I have referred; but I put it to them whether this is not a subject that ought to be dealt with by the leaders of public opinion in America? Surely these European thinkers ought either to be answered or followed. I affirm plainly that the political institutions of America are being used in Europe mainly in the interest of reaction and despotism. Every evil result is quoted for the disgrace of republicanism; every good result is quoted to the assumed credit of the degree to which we have preserved monarchical forms in the "Upper House" and the "one man power." The republicans believe that to our preservation of these unrepublican forms are to be attributed our lobbyism, our presidential scandals, and the proverbial want of dignity or ability observable in our House of Representatives. Between such antagonists as these, how can earnest and cultivated Americans remain silent?

A TOUCHING LETTER.

When it is said, as it sometimes is, that THE INDEX "has no spiritual nutriment for hungering and thirsting hearts,"—that it is simply "destructive," and does nothing for the "religious upbuilding" of men and women who have cut loose from Orthodoxy,—we are conscious of a strong wish to take such critics into our study and read to them some of the great piles of letters of which the following is an average specimen, written less than a month ago from Dakota Territory:—

"... I am keeping a file of them [the papers] and intend to get them bound at the end of the year; and so of course I cannot spare a single number. . . . I feel that you are in a noble work, and can bid you God-speed with all my heart. I do not think there is a copy taken in this town; still that may be a mistake—hope it is. I have long felt the need of some such periodical, calm, able, scientific, and ever ready to beard the lion, superstition, in his den; and the best of it is that the lion's minions can neither wheedle nor buy you off. All my life long I have felt that my reason was at war with Christianity and all the theological teachings of my youth; and I have suffered years of agony in consequence. Often have I told my wife that I would willingly be roasted alive, if by that means I could reconcile reason and revelation—yes, and meant every word of it, too. We were both members of the Free-Will Baptist Church, then, and could not come out because we had no leader; and superstition had so blunted our senses and benumbed our feelings that proscription for opinion's sake began to lose somewhat of its hideousness, as Pope says of vice being 'seen too oft;' but we had not yet embraced the monster. There are millions of earth's unhappy sons and daughters whose minds revolt at the absurdities and contradictions of Orthodoxy, but who, like myself, have not sufficient independence of mind to break away from it, and let reason assert her rights, without a leader. That leader I have found in THE INDEX: would to God I had found such a leader twenty-five years ago! I feel now that life has higher aims, and is more intensely real; and that the infinite God is not the author of confusion but of peace. But I am tiring your patience. Please excuse these hasty, rambling thoughts, and believe me, etc."

We print this letter for three reasons,—to show the incredulous that Free Religion is the bread and water of life to at least some famishing spirits; to encourage and stimulate our fellow-workers in THE INDEX, who little know the profound good they are doing by their labors, yet whose thoughts call forth hosts of such touching expressions of gratitude as the above; and to quicken the zeal of our readers to extend the blessings of religious light to the great multitudes still groping in darkness. If you whose eyes now read these lines did but comprehend a tenth part of the good which we know that THE INDEX is doing, you would surely be most willing and glad to help us extend its circulation,—yes, even at the expense of no little time, labor, and money. The obstacles in the way of its extension are far more numerous and formidable than is dreamed of by those who are not intimately acquainted with the facts; and the indirect but very valuable aid given to most journals by the general press is studiously withheld from a journal whose cause is so unpopular as ours. THE INDEX has had to dispense with allies, and owes such success as it has achieved to the intrinsic merits of its cause and the widespread co-operation of many individual friends. On these it must still rely. Will they not be stirred to fresh exertions by the letter printed above, which is only one out of many grateful and encouraging "voices from the people"?

THE TRUE POINT.

It would seem that some regard our earnest advocacy of the Liberal League movement as an implied censure of all who are not convinced of its necessity, and therefore take no part in it. Not at all. We believe that the highest welfare of the nation requires an immediate and determined effort to carry out faithfully the fundamental American principle of non-union of Church and State; and we consider it, therefore, as our private duty to urge this effort as a great public duty. But it is a duty to no one, if our belief is wrong. The discussion should be wholly on the main question: is it necessary to organize now, or at any time, to carry out the above principle? On this question let all sides be heard; and we specially desire an able discussion of this subject in THE INDEX. Strong articles touching it, if brief, will be heartily welcomed to these columns, no matter which side they take; and we intend to give them the precedence of all others. Pack your weightiest objections into few words, and they shall be hospitably entertained. But do not be offended if we reply to them. If others do not think organization a public duty, that is no reason why we should forbear to urge the contrary opinion. There is no question of motives now, but only of THE MOST ENLIGHTENED VIEWS OF DUTY. Let us all stick to the point, take each other's fidelity to conscience for granted, and ask only what wisdom commands.

P. S. The above was in type before the Directors' meeting of March 13. Of course we must cancel what is said about future articles in THE INDEX.

Proudhon declared that "cannibalism still subsists amongst us: witness the eucharistic sacrament and the Code Penal." It would be difficult for believers in transubstantiation to deny the justice of the charge.

Pierre Joseph Proudhon, the apostle of "mutualism," laid down in his Mémoires sur la Propriété the famous propositions that "property is theft," and that "God is evil (Dieu c'est le mal). In his Système des Contradictions Économiques ou Philosophie de la Misère, he laid down his third paradox that "the true form of government is anarchy."

According to the Cleveland Leader, which gives details of a revival going on in that city, Rev. Mr. Duncan (Baptist) remarked that "the devil makes the sinner ask this question, 'how to come to Jesus?'" Now we confess we do not know how to "come" to him; and since it is the devil who would prompt us to ask how, we incessantly drop the subject.

The Christian Register says: "If you have friends inclined to ultra-radical speculations, be sure to send them copies of Mr. Abbot's 'Impeachment of Christianity,' at your earliest convenience. This 'flimsy pamphlet,' as the Westminster Review calls it, is a sovereign remedy." We shall be happy to furnish our good friend of the Register with a generous package of the tract in question for free distribution, and will run our risk of the consequences.

Mr. Hammond, the revivalist, testifies to some remarkable events (if the Iowa State Leader is to be trusted); among which is the following. A congregation in Atchison, Kansas, prayed that their church might be struck by lightning without injury to any one, when "infidels" should be present. This prayer was granted the very next day, when an "infidel" arose and declared, "There is no God!" Mr. Hammond asseverates that he was on the platform at the time. Why did not the congregation pray that the lightning might strike the "infidels"? Probably they will next time, now that they have discovered how influential they are with Providence.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

OUR SATURDAY EVENING Transcript gives us, under the head of "Religious Intelligence," a pretty good intimation of what is going to happen in the churches the following day. It is often interesting reading. Perhaps it is the cream of the whole matter. Here are notices of forty different services. So much talking, preaching, praying, and praising, in one little city! What a religious Babel a Sabbath day must be to the ear that is supposed to gather in all sounds! To be prayed to, and to be praised so!

"Praise to the face

runs the couplet. And the Supreme, the Hear-er, with good grace might he not complain, "Why pray these people so noisily? Let them put their hands to the plough." But I see that it is all right, the passing phase of our evolution, and I do not mock it; only look on to the time when Godhead will not be so poorly apprehended. I recall sometimes, by Mr. Fairfield, strange lines to many; lines that picture God-head "seeking itself in object."

"Seek, seek, seek,
Till my fullness I wreak
Of Godhead on the Man:

On, on, on,
From dawn to dusk, from dusk to dawn,
World days and nights,
Along the heights
Of Time's historic plan,
Upward I toil,
Through nights of dream and through days of turmoil,

A pilgrim worn and wan;
Till on the height,
Scarce yet in sight,
I shout the psalm of the Future Man,—
Till on my Godhead's topmost peak,
That found which yet I seek,
My clarion blast I wreak
Upon the fullness of Historic Man.

Godhead, though conditioned as thought,
For the fashion of that which is not
I struggle forever,
With restless endeavor,
Till my Godhead in Manhood be wrought."

And all good souls will strive with Deity for this divine accomplishment.

"For object is the glass subject creates
To see its face in."

IN GOING THROUGH THIS LIST of topics for the sermons of yesterday, I found that some one—Mr. Ware, I presume—would speak in Arlington-street Church of "People worth Knowing." No doubt he would make a most judicious selection. And yet—well, one likes the privilege of knowing everybody if he chooses. It isn't just the thing to throw anybody to the dogs. But, alas! the dogs are but too well fed.

E. E. HALE WOULD HAVE a sermon on "sympathy and kindness the method of Jesus, and the only true method in restoring and reforming the criminal." A timely word, I should say; but little will it be heeded. A people whose highest idea is that of the State and the protection it guarantees, or the redress of force, enter not swiftly or confidently into the forbearance and charity towards offenders that precede the re-creation of human nature in higher and nobler forms. The spirit of murder is in the air, and shared by the criminal and his judges as well. One can hardly say which was the most appalling, the original murders or the proposition of a New York journal to hang the whole batch of murderers at one and the same time for effective example. What a stench of blood! And this will redeem and protect the land. No!

MR. FOOTE WILL REPEAT a discourse on "our personal responsibility for the national sins." I suppose all the national sins are personal. It is Ames, Colfax, Wilson, Brooks, and other names too numerous to mention. The tempter said, "Put money in thy purse," and lo!—the story is familiar. Will it not come finally to appear that money itself is the wicked root; for if it were not, who of us could love it? Perhaps, however, the real offence lies in the fact that money so largely represents not one's own creative industry but that filched from others. While dead money earns so much, living men will fold their hands, and smile, and sn. National sins! Yes, indeed; not of Congress alone, but of the whole business community. "I am your friend; but then, business is business, you know." This double-headedness, as John Wetherbee might call it—can the two mix for good?

MR. ALGER, AS I mentioned last week, would speak of "Dramatic Art and Human Life." There is one thing to object to in these otherwise admirable discourses, if the reports I see are correct. I confess I suspect them, and so will not say, "Mr. Alger said," but speak of the ideas as I find it, come from where it may. "The divine plan for lifting the multitude is to give them some noble man for an example to imitate. Christ is a divine soul, held up for reverend contemplation and dramatic representation by his disciples." I distrust the words "imitate" and "dramatic." Doubtless there is enough of imitation, and enough of dramatic display; but in so far as these abound are we strayed away from the verities and realities of life; and that's what's the matter, O preacher! Imitate Jesus? Play the part of Jesus? I know of few people who, if they would actually play their own part, and neither attempt the Lord's nor the Devil's, would not place all the rest of the world under a debt of gratitude. Even William Shakspeare, writing for actors could say:—

"To thine own self be true."

OTHER SUBJECTS I find on the list, such as "Words and Things;" "The Young Man of To-Day"—a wishy-washy subject; "Did Jesus teach I guess if I do about right the Lord will take care of me?" by Mr. Dunn, the Christadelphian of Pennsylvania; one might think that Mr. Dunn, or anybody else, so doing, could take care of himself; "True Religion," by Mr. Winslow; "Piety and Politics," by Dr. Fulton, and on Monday noon he will answer the question, "Why are wealthy and cultured men not converts to Christ?" And so these subjects drift about, and the question presses upon us, How much wiser, how much nearer the kingdom?

I HAVE HEARD Miss Sarah Smiley, who has so much fame as an effective preacher in Evangelical pulpits. She seems to be the soul of kindness; a very sweet orange. A little tart in the fruit preserves it as abidingly palatable. As to her discourse, Miss Smiley preaches like the majority of her brothers; only her words are always affectionate, and I don't suppose she says much about "the lake of fire." Just wherein her power lies, from one hearing it is difficult to report. Possibly it is in the fact that in Orthodox pulpits a woman is a most refreshing novelty.

MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL has been giving three lectures before the Second Radical Club, on the subject of woman and her share in human rights. The first two were biographical; the last was a summing up of the cause of woman, going over the ground in the most thorough and convincing manner. I don't know that I have ever heard the subject so well stated before. And these lectures were all written and delivered here in Boston seventeen years ago. Mrs. Dall is one of the pioneers, and though less famous than some, she has toiled hard and with large practical results. A little too severe in her speech upon some of the later "reformers," to satisfy my own sense of fair play, she nevertheless has a real and large fund of charity which I doubt not would make her actions wise and good. Not to be "shocked," not to be too confident that everything new is "absurd," not to condemn outright strange theories as vicious, and their advocates as vile; these are some of the neutralities which inhere in a progressive civilization.

TYLOR'S "PRIMITIVE CULTURE."

AN ABSTRACT.

ARTICLE SECOND—PREVIOUS WORK BY MR. TYLOR.

In the earlier volume devoted by Mr. Tylor to a record of results of ethnographical study, the Early History of Manhood, a single problem was kept in view through a series of examinations of several outlying topics of the general subject, the more important branches of which are now discussed in the two volumes on Primitive Culture. This problem was this. When similar arts, customs, beliefs, or legends are found in several distant regions, among people not known to be of the same stock, is this similarity to be accounted for by the like working of men's minds under like conditions, or is it a proof of more or less direct relationship or intercourse between the races among whom it is found? If the former, the similarity will have no historical value whatever; but if the latter be the true explanation, the historical value of the fact will be very great. In the case, for example, of general belief in the continuance of the soul's existence after death, it is impossible to argue justly that all mankind have inherited this belief from a common source, because we find an ample possible explanation of the belief in savage experience of dreams, visions, apparitions, similar to those of modern spiritualism, which suggest in the most forcible manner that man still exists, a shadowy or ethereal soul, after the death of the body. Two great theories of dreams and visions are proved, by a great variety of facts, to have been current among the lower races: (1) that the figures which appear in dreams come into the presence of the dreamer, or (2) that the dreamer goes out from his body and meets these figures, as his soul journeys abroad. On either theory the dreamer has abundant reason for believing that spirits exist apart from bodies. The argument is urged in certain quarters of late as a new ground of sure conviction; but ethnography finds it in full vigor in the lower stages of mental development, a natural product of savage observation and thinking in the remotest regions of the world. This being the case, extreme ignorance alone will permit the assumption that widely prevalent notions of a future state are due to diffusion from a single geographical centre. On the other hand, this assumption might be made in regard to certain stories which appear in the mythologies of various parts of the world, though it is by no means easy to convert the permissible assumption into anything like a strong certainty.

The use of gesture as a mode of utterance, and the universality and uniformity of gesture-language, wherever occasion for it has arisen, to the extent even that savages will at once comprehend it as it springs up among the deaf and dumb, and have everywhere made themselves intelligible to one another by means of it, furnishes Mr. Tylor, in his Early History of Mankind, with a capital field for suggestive initial application of the method by which he proposed to penetrate the problem of the earliest growth of the human mind. Modern experience with the deaf and dumb had shown beyond a question that minds incapable of learning ordinary language will, by their own independent working, derive a gesture-speech well answering the purposes of utterance, and readily comprehensible by other minds in the same situation; that such minds will do this of themselves far better than it can be done for them, and will attain a proficiency in gesture-speech almost without effort, which the educated speaking man can with difficulty attain at all; and that this gesture-speech is readily understood, is in fact recognized with delight, by the Indian, or the Chinaman, or any other representative of the lower levels of culture. Hence the ground for assuming that gesture-language is a natural mode of expression common to mankind in general, and essentially one and the same in all times and all countries; a fact which strongly suggests that in the more elementary processes, at least, of the mind the various races of man are not marked by specific differences.

From this it is easy to pass to word-language, as a higher form of utterance, alongside of which gesture-language has played an important part in the original utterance of mankind, and which may reasonably be presumed to have been formed under the law disclosed by the formation and use of the gesture-speech. The subject is obscure, but it certainly seems more likely than not that there may be a similarity between the process by which words came to serve for utterance, and that by which gestures are seen to serve as words. Beyond certain classes of words the living connection between word and idea is now dead; but the considerable evidence which we have from the study of gesture-speech points distinctly to the view that certain words were at first used to express certain ideas, for some definite reason. Man is essentially what the derivation of his name among our Aryan race imports—he who thinks, he who means; and we may reasonably suppose that there was reason in the primitive adoption of words. However, it is to be confessed that we know very little about the origin of language.

But of picture-writing again, as of gesture-speech, it can be said that it is found among savage races in all quarters of the globe, and that its principle seems to be the same everywhere. Not only do savage paintings, or scratchings, or carvings on rocks, have a family likeness, whether we find them in North or South America, in Siberia or Australia; but the picture-writings of savages are like what children make untaught even in civilized countries. This seems to prove that the mind of the uncultured man works in much the same way at all times and everywhere.

From picture-writing to word-writing is a step which can be traced in more than one important instance, though only in that of the Egyptian hieroglyphic alphabet can the development from the stage of pure pictures to that of pure letters be clearly followed. As to most of the alphabets which are or have been in use in the world, we are unable to tell how they came to be made, yet are fairly warranted in assuming for the earliest of them a pictorial origin.

Another direction in which man may be observed in a state like that of early childhood, just commencing to learn and aiding himself by the most primitive methods, is that of savage use of images and names, which are supposed to have a real connection with the objects for which they stand, so that these objects can be affected through the image or the name precisely as if directly acted upon; as when the strong craving of the human mind for a material support to the religious sentiment has produced idols and fetiches over most parts of the world, and at most periods of its history; or in the mass of customs and superstitious relating to personal names, which imply that the name is part of the very being of the person who bears it. Sorcery becomes an intelligible and natural art at the level of minds accustomed to identify whatever had belonged to a person with the very being of that person; hence the ethnologist judges with considerable confidence that the practices of the sorcerer among the lower races belong naturally to the savage level, and are not to be regarded as mutilated and misunderstood fragments of a higher system of belief and knowledge. That the similarity of these practices everywhere may indicate diffusion from a common source can be plausibly argued, yet no conclusion to this effect can be safely drawn in the existing state of the evidence.

As to the general question, whether the lower races, as we find them in their earliest history, are to be supposed advancing from a still lower state, or may be presumed to have declined from an original higher condition, Mr. Tylor's important chapter in his Early History of Mankind presents a variety of interesting facts which lead him to pronounce with some confidence, that the history of culture as a whole is one of progress, not of degeneration, and that from age to age there has been a growth in man's power over Nature which no backward influences have been able permanently to check. Further special proof of this is derived from a careful demonstration of the fact that a transition from implements of stone to those of metal has taken place in almost every district of the habitable globe, and that a progress from ruder to more perfect modes of making fire and boiling food is traceable in many different countries.

The survey made by Mr. Tylor of several groups of customs which are everywhere found deeply rooted in the early history of mankind, pure products of savage psychology, and of some myths of observation, which actual facts originally suggested to the savage mind, with a concluding examination of the geographical distribution of myths, filled out the plan of the preliminary volume, The Early History of Mankind, to which we have briefly referred. The results of the study thus far conducted seemed to be that the wide differences in the mental state of the various races of mankind are differences of development rather than of origin, of degree rather than of kind; that the history of mankind has been on the whole a history of progress; and that progress has been sometimes by independent invention, sometimes by inheritance from ancestors in a distant region, and sometimes by transmission from one race to another.

INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.

An eloquent and popular Orthodox clergyman of Cleveland greatly electrified his audience a few Sundays ago by the following burst of rhapsody: "Hear it, O ye heavens; ye angels that wing your flight from world to world; ye blood-washed saints around the throne! hear it, O blessed martyrs that have gone up through much tribulation! hear it, ye archangels that do the will of the most High! hear it, O Son of the ever living God,—our blessed Christianity is impeached! Yes, impeached by a man up here in Toledo—the editor of a paper called THE INDEX; and, my brethren, if I had the power I would put it in the Index Expurgatorius!"

The question is, has the reverend gentleman been reading THE INDEX so that he knows what he is talking about, and would he really allow his congregation a like valuable privilege? That certainly is what his declaration means, whatever he may have meant by it. Let us enlighten the gentleman on this important point. The "Index" was established by the popes of Rome, and consisted of two parts: 1. The Index Librorum Prohibitorum—books that were not allowed to be read; and 2. The Index Expurgatorius—books that were considered safe to be read and were allowed and commended (see Encyclopædia Britannica, Mendham's account of the Indices Prohibitorii and Expurgatorii).

I hope, Mr. Editor, that you will take the gentleman at his word and send some one to solicit subscribers in his congregation for your paper. But if he recants the declaration and asserts, as I have no doubt he will, that he intended quite the contrary and would rather see THE INDEX burned than read, then perhaps his congregation might have something to say about submitting to such papal authority. Possibly his hearers may want things thus cut and dried for them. They may remember perhaps that the Index Prohibitorum, into which their preacher would put the Toledo INDEX, has contained some of the noblest works ever written. As a rule, indeed, the best have been thrown out and the poorest retained and ordered to be read.

At the same time, it may as well be said to that congregation that Francis E. Abbot is not the only man who impeaches Christianity. Let them not falsely suppose he stands alone, or that, if he and THE INDEX were either effectively prohibited or expunged, there would then be an end of impeachment.

AN APPEAL FOR AID.

MR. GILEAD, Ohio, March 3, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Allow me to call the attention of all the friends of Woman's Suffrage in this State to the importance of looking well to the candidates that shall come before the people for the Constitutional Convention. If this question is of the importance which we believe it to be, we cannot be too earnest in our endeavors to secure such a delegation as shall frame a Constitution strictly accordant with the fundamental principles of our government. And when the best efforts have been made in this direction, there will still remain the necessity to canvass the State for signatures to petitions, which shall make it apparent to the Convention that the people are ready for this important change; also to secure such public sentiment as may lead to its ratification by the voters of the State.

To carry out such an enterprise must require money to meet the large expense necessarily involved. The Executive Committee of the Ohio Woman's Suffrage Society enter upon this year's work without a dollar in the treasury, and yet they are expected to accomplish this herculean task.

We appeal to the earnest friends of progress throughout the State, to come to our aid in this work. Give us your influence in the political movements which shall decide the character of the Convention. Give us your names, and your influence to secure other names, to a memorial that shall express your views to the Convention; and above all contribute means to aid in carrying forward this enterprise. A dollar, or five, or ten dollars, to those who give no appreciable time to this work, will be a trifle compared with the sacrifices made by the active workers in the cause.

Any sums that our friends may contribute may be forwarded to Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, who will hand it over to the proper officer of the Society.

In behalf of the Ohio Woman's Suffrage Association,

H. M. T. CUTLER, President.

NEW YORK ITEMS.

Mr. Frothingham's sermon on the "Naked Truth" doubtless disturbed preconceived ideas in the minds of some of his hearers. The naked truth, according to his showing is, in a vast majority of cases, not at all a desirable thing; is in fact not the real truth, but merely the unsightly skeleton thereof. The clothed truth is the real truth, and is what we want. Nudity is seldom or never beautiful. A narrow-souled person may present what he calls the naked truth in respect to a transaction involving the reputation of his neighbor. The picture is drawn in the rude, hard lines of actual happening, and is really nothing but an outline. Not until this is taken and covered with a net-work of circumstances and conditions,—things which preceded, surrounded, shaped, colored, and otherwise influenced these bare outlines, will the real truth of the transaction be apparent.

Passing on to higher illustrations: "What richness and beauty," said the speaker, "gather about our ideal of a God, as the ages roll away! Compare the God of Herbert Spencer and of John Tyndall with the bald, bare God of the ancient Hebrews." Yea, verily; but, O courageous preacher, what scorings you will have to take for the utterance of this most happily clothed truth!

—In speaking of Prof. Tyndall, I am reminded of the unanimous verdict of lecture-going New Yorkers, that by no other scientist has such glamor of fascination been cast upon those reserves of Nature which for want of a better term might be called her Shadow Land; since it is by means of shadows or spectra that most of our knowledge is gained. Many of the experiments impress one like perfect pictures or poems; not only embodying some eloquent fact of natural truth, but by suggestion reaching far out into the realm of the imagination. Of all the delighted throng who witnessed the lovely marvel of the lead-crystals; who watched it growing like a plant under their eyes, putting forth here a leaf and there a cluster, here a delicate frond, and there a coiling filament,—I can scarcely believe one will ever again speak of "dead matter" without a mental reservation. The goose-girl who sat beside me said it was like a glimpse of fairyland, and she half expected to see the weird thing next put forth legs or wings, and calmly betake itself to the duties of life. Surely if these are not the first blind gropings of the life principle, it is difficult to imagine anything that could better counterfeit them.

—An occasion of pleasurable interest was Miss Faithfull's reception by the women of New York at Steinway Hall. She is a stoutly built lady, plain in dress, with a kindly and resolute face, a good voice, and thoroughly self-possessed manner. Her sketch of the average English girl of the middle-class gave pitiable proof that shallowness and shams in education are not confined to our side of the water. "Dipped in a weak solution of boarding-school study, she emerges with a thin varnish of accomplishments, pretty enough at first, but which soon wears off." "To will to work, and to work with a will," is the motto she is endeavoring to bring within the comprehension of these aimless, useless ones. Miss Faithfull enjoys the personal acquaintance and sympathy of many leaders of reform in England, both men and women, and has already won for herself hosts of friends in this country.

—At the close of the lecture a poem was recited, so really beautiful in its spirit of human tenderness, yet so marred and enfeebled by a debilitating religious sentiment, that I am tempted to give it here a few words of analysis. The story was of a woman who dwelt by the sea-shore, very poor and, but for the one child that now lies dying in her arms, utterly alone. Watching at midnight for her darling to draw its last breath, she perceives a sudden glare light up her room, and, looking out upon the reddened waters, her eyes behold the fearful spectacle of a ship on fire. Its wretched multitude must perish unless boats can reach them. In the hamlet behind the rocks the three fishers are all asleep, but by ringing the chapel bell she can rouse them to the rescue. She makes the heroic resolve to leave her unconscious babe to die alone, while she speeds on her errand of mercy. Softly she lays it in its little crib, kisses its cold cheek, and then to our ill-concealed dismay—she kneels down by the bed, and in a prayer two or three stanzas long commits her babe to a merciful Christ, and asks his aid in the work she is about to do.

After this fearful delay, we are prepared for disaster; but no—she hastens to the church, climbs in at the window (for the rusty door-hinge has not been oiled for her coming), pulls the bell-rope vigorously, and in five minutes more the hamlet is astir, and boats are being launched. This is very sweet and tender. We feel that she has earned the precious reward which the story grants her, of hearing that every soul on board the ship is saved. But this does not satisfy the sense of religious justice in the mind of the writer. So when the heroine recovers from the swoon into which she had fallen, she is greeted by the cooling words of her child, who is brought before her astonished eyes in a state of rapid convalescence. This is reward number two.

Even with this, improbable as it is, we feel in no heart to quarrel. But when in further addition the good woman's husband, whom she had believed long since lost at sea, is suddenly heard from, and the promise of his early return guaranteed, a prosperous and well-to-do seaman, to the bosom of his waiting family, something in our conscience protests against this heaping up of the rewards of virtue. We are uneasily conscious of an inclination to smile through our tears. Irreverent as it seems, we cannot help being reminded of Hood's quack doctor, who sold his infallible nostrum for deafness to a woman who had not heard the loudest sounds for forty years; and with such startling results, that we are told how—

"The very next day
She heard from her husband at Botany Bay!"

Seriously, in view of such diluted moral teaching as this, is it not time that other religious papers, as well as THE INDEX, should put in a plea for "Robust" against "Sentimental Goodness"? H. L. B. R.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1873.

CLEAR DEFINITION.

It is insisted in some quarters that the movement represented by THE INDEX is a narrow one, because it insists upon a certain definition of Christianity as a justification of itself. It is called a creed movement. But is not this a confounding of two different things? A creed is one thing; a clear definition is another. To make a creed a test of fellowship is vastly different from insisting upon clear ideas of things. If Christianity in the popular apprehension can be made synonymous with perfect liberty of thought and action, we have no objection to accepting it, provided there is a distinct understanding all round that such is what it really means. But when as a matter of fact it is not so understood,—when in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is understood as implying outward authority of some kind,—have we not a right to understand it so, and on that ground reject it? Is it not just as bigoted to insist upon a broad definition of Christianity as to insist upon a narrow one? Is not Mr. May just as bigoted as Mr. Abbot? He insists that we admit his loose definition of Christianity as true, and stay inside; with this disadvantage, however, that he is almost alone in his definition, while Mr. Abbot's is practically accepted by the vast majority of those who profess to be Christians, and who are supposed to know what they profess. But when such radically different ideas are attached to a word, have we not a right for our practical guidance to attach what seems to us the most proper idea, and not accordingly? Mr. May and the Christian Register have a right to make their definition of Christianity as broad and loose as they consider—little or no education, and of those who have received something of that which is so called, the process has been such as to awaken no desire for continued study, or to hint at the means by which self-improvement might be carried forward.

And here we come to the chief rational hope of the world in regard to all reforms. And this lies in the education of the young, from their very birth, and even before their birth, would but those who are destined to become parents acquaint themselves with the laws which regulate the highest well-being of their offspring. The right and the value of compulsory education, which the State as well as all humanity owes to itself, is gaining ground in this country as well as in Europe; and, where it has been tried, results seem to warrant its adoption. And why should not our State governments immediately enter upon an earnest consideration of the subject? Prof. Huxley, speaking upon this subject, remarks: "If my neighbor brings up his children untaught and untrained to earn their living, he is doing his best to destroy my freedom, by increasing the burden of taxation for the support of jails and work-houses, for which I have to pay."

But then our schools themselves need reforming, in order to secure desired results. A knowledge of Nature and of her laws should enter more largely into their course of study. If the forces which govern matter were made known, and their laws as applied to mechanics were explained, together with the powers and limits of man in relation to them, how much thought might be stimulated which, by observation of the operations connected with daily toil, might lead to still improved inventions. A general knowledge of the laws of Nature would infuse something of enthusiasm into the otherwise listless labor of the worker. He would come to feel something of his own kinship to the universe at large. As part and parcel of it, he would find pleasure in feeling that, in his individual way, he was contributing somewhat towards the progress and perfection of his race. How much food for elevated thought would thus be provided, to interest and enliven each day's labor, and to animate him in seeking still farther to penetrate Nature's mysteries! By these means, too, the certainty of a penalty, sooner or later, arising from a violation of Nature's laws, moral, as well as physical, would naturally be discovered, and thus crime prevented; as few would be found so fool-hardy as to "kick against the pricks" of their own foreseen destruction. CLERICAL AGITATION.

EASTON, Pa., Feb. 21, 1873.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—A meeting was held on the 20th instant at this place, at which delegates were chosen to attend a convention to be held at the Cooper Institute, New York, on Wednesday next. This movement to tamper with our constitution and rob it of its best feature, if successful, will bring anarchy and ruin upon our government, and would be but the forerunner of one of the most terrible wars the world has ever known.

In a country like ours, composed of the most incongruous of religious elements from all countries, such a movement can be attended with nothing but a disastrous result, either to the government or the Christian religion. As the Constitution now is, it admits all on an equality, regardless of their religious ideas, and leaves them to follow the dictates of their own minds. The amendment proposed, if carried out, would disfranchise all disbelievers in Christ as a ruler of nations, undermine the government, and enslave the people.

One year ago, when I heard you lecture in Fraternity Hall, Boston, I hoped this issue would die out of itself; but I had my fears, which grow stronger as I look around. Like the murmur and sigh of the distant tempest, perhaps it may burst upon us with a hurricane of religious persecution and fanaticism. This very issue has caused the downfall of empires and nations. Franklin, Paine, and Jefferson, plainly seeing the disastrous effect of any combination of State and Church, framed our Constitution to give all sects equal rights as long as they do not interfere with the government or the individual rights of others. That this present movement is inaugurated and instigated by the clergy, who seek for power, is beyond doubt; their first object being to destroy our Constitution in its present form, as it is impossible to accomplish their purpose as it now is. A reverend gentleman at the late meeting stated that there were thousands of young men who would be glad to lay down their lives to see the present proposed Amendment passed, if need be. But I hope civilization is too far advanced to repeat the scenes of carnage of the past. But these are the sentiments with which we have to contend in the coming contest. Thomas Paine was criticised, and slurs cast upon his name; and THE INDEX was brought forth and was criticised with zeal worthy of a fanatic. The arguments used were, that the majority must rule, and that their opponents were a miserable minority of infidels, Jews, etc. The people are supreme and must rule. But I would inquire, if the people are supreme, is the minority to be thrown into a state of religious slavery without a struggle? I hope this proposed Amendment will go no farther than the source whence it originated.

Yours,

F. SYMMES.

THE SUNDAY LIBRARY QUESTION.

[From the Boston Journal of Feb. 25.]

An adjourned meeting of clergymen opposed to the opening of the Public Library on the Lord's Day was held in the vestry of Tremont Temple on Monday, the Melancon being in use. The room was crowded to overflowing. Rev. James B. Dunn presided, and Rev. Mr. Garner was Secretary. The President hoped that in these deliberations they would remember that they were a spectacle for angels and men.

After the reading of the records of the last meeting, Rev. Dr. Webb presented the report of the Committee appointed at the previous meeting. He explained that the report did not fully express the feelings of individual members of the Committee on the question, as individual opinion was held in abeyance in order that a wise and judicious report might be made and approved. He then read the report of the Committee as follows:—

REPORT.

The Committee in presenting their report make no attempt to cover the whole ground, nor to give anything like full expression to their individual opinions concerning this broad vital question. They aim at such utterances as will command the cordial assent of all those who agree with them in principle, and offer the following resolutions:—

We regret the decision of the city government to open the Public Library on the Lord's Day, as encouraging one of the evil tendencies of the times.

Resolved, That the tendency to obliterate all distinction between the Sabbath and other days of the week is greatly to be deplored. Beyond all consideration or doubt, the remembering of the Sabbath day to keep it holy has been one of the grand causes of our prosperity. Perhaps at this juncture we may find an intimation of our duty in the command of the Lord to Samuel when Israel clamored, "Now make us a king to judge us like all nations." And the Lord said unto Samuel, "Hearken, for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. Howbeit, yet protest solemnly unto them and show them the manner of the being that shall reign over them." The history of the world shows that the only cure of some sins is for the perpetrators to suffer the consequences. To that same people it was said, "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen, and the Lord will not hear you in that day." And to see in these modern times that history repeats itself, requires not much more than ordinary discernment.

Resolved, That we do not see the necessity for opening the Public Library on the Lord's Day, either as a place of pleasant resort or as a means of public improvement. We have already more sanctuaries than are filled, more church parlors than are used, more Sabbath schools, Bible classes, and mission chapels than are sought after. Besides all these and what cannot be forgotten, in every family there is or may be a Bible, the book of books, whose words divinely inspired are spirit and life, without which with all our libraries the world is poor, and with which without any of our libraries the world is rich, the light of the individual soul, the salt of society and the life of national freedom,—in every family there is a Bible, and loyalty of heart and conscience to the God of the Bible is the only sure basis of sound morals, of private and public virtue. A sound philosophy indicates, and the statistics of crime as presented by both Scotland and France prove, that education dissevered from morality is more likely to prove a curse than a blessing. Mental power uncontrolled by moral principle may be a sword for the defence of the right, or an ax in the hands of a mad man. Development of the intellect, purchased at the expense of a dwarfed and despised morality, is too dearly bought.

Resolved, That the reason assigned in our community for the opening of the Public Library on the Lord's Day, viz., the accommodation of thousands of young men who have no comfortable apartments in which to read books and pass the hours of the Sabbath, if the real reason, is not all met by the opening of a reading room in which only a few scores, at most, and those of the first comers, can find place to sit or stand, and that to the practical exclusion of the hundreds and thousands who come afterwards. If the necessity for such accommodation exists, and this is a humane and genuine movement, to meet it, then, long rooms in the whole building should be filled with chairs and tables, and supplied with Bibles, religious books, and periodicals. Nor this alone, but other buildings, furniture, and books should be multiplied an hundred fold.

Resolved, That the interests of the working people who are deeply involved in the questions of the Lord's Day demand its religious observance. In lands where the Lord's Day is not regarded, professed Christians have no time either for rest or worship, the factories are run, the stores and markets continue their traffic, and all secular employments go forward as on other days. At the same time, as the results prove, men earn no more in seven days than in six, wages are depressed as the time is extended, while ignorance and superstition, the instruments of wrong and oppression and tyranny, gain on every side.

Again and again it has been proved that man cannot bear the strain of daily toil, without the rest of the Sabbath. Recently, in San Francisco, merchants, printers, actors, barbers, and representatives of all classes, petitioned for the restoration of the Christian Sabbath. But mere rest is not enough for man. The criminal, compelled to hard labor, profits greatly by a seventh day of criminal rest. But what is enough for the ox and the ass, is not enough for man. Neither unthinking relaxation nor intellectual employment meets man's necessities. His religious nature is the highest and worthiest part of him, and to refresh, quicken, and ennoble this nature, the religious observance of the Sabbath is a necessity. Compared with the full religious advantages of the Christian Sabbath, with its sanctuaries and Bibles, all the libraries and lectures, papers and periodicals, excursions and entertainments in the land, are of small account.

Resolved, That for the sake of what the Christian Sabbath has done and is, above all else, divinely ordained to do, wherever it is kept according to the fourth commandment—for the sake of that intellectual and moral quickening which it invariably secures—for the sake of that social elevation and political liberty, justice and purity which it is sure to foster and develop—and for the sake also of that holy communion with our God and Savior which its needful rest and quiet allows,—we are bound by all the ties of brotherhood and motives of benevolence to make every honorable exertion to preserve its sacredness and perpetuate its blessings.

Mr. Capen thought the report laid itself liable to criticism, and spoke of the distinction between the Sabbath and the Lord's Day.

The Chairman called attention to the call which was addressed only to clergymen opposed to the opening of the Library.

It was then voted to limit speakers to three minutes each, and to act upon the report by separate resolutions.

The report was signed by E. B. Webb, Justin D. Fulton, George C. Lorimer, Edward Annand, L. L. Briggs, A. D. Sargent, S. F. Upham, Jas. B. Dunn.

The first resolution was again read, after which Rev. Mr. McKeon said that the City Government must know that the moral sentiment of the people was opposed to the opening of the Library, and that they had done wrong in voting to have it opened.

The resolutions were then adopted without further discussion.

The question was asked whether the Committee had thought that the action of the City Government was against the law of the State.

Rev. Dorus Clark, D. D., thought something ought to be done if the City Council had violated law.

Rev. Bradford K. Pierce, D. D., hoped the meeting would not attempt to decide a question of law.

Dr. Pierce also offered a resolution for the printing of the report in pamphlet form, to be circulated through the churches and in the secular and religious press.

The President stated that there was a layman's Committee who had charge of such questions, and it would be proper to refer that subject to them.

Rev. Dr. Webb said the matter was before the Committee and that they concluded to leave the matter to some others to bring it before the Supreme Court.

Rev. Dr. Young moved to amend by instructing the Committee to appear before the City Council in person and read the document to them. He wanted a good stout Committee to go before the City Government and make them tremble.

Rev. Mark Trafton hoped the motion would be withdrawn. It was too much like the Donnybrook Fair business—whenever you see a head hit it. If the City Council wanted to read their report, all well; if not, then just as well.

Rev. Dr. Young said he made his motion out of respect to the City Council. (Laughter.) He withdrew his motion in accordance with the apparent wish of the meeting.

The following were appointed by the meeting a committee to take charge of any business which might naturally grow out of these meetings: Rev. J. D. Fulton, D. D., Baptist; Rev. Dr. Briggs, Universalist; Rev. S. F. Upham, D. D., Methodist; Rev. James B. Dunn, Presbyterian; Rev. J. M. Manning, D. D., Congregationalist; Rev. A. H. Vinton, D. D., Episcopalian; Rev. B. F. Edmonds, Christian.

After prayer and the singing of a hymn the meeting adjourned.

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the Idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

Address, THE INDEX, Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete Index of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 22 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 13) will be sent postpaid on receipt of eighty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT; "The Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. Newman. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Cultured Free Thought.

The Index Association,

With its Principal Office at No. 143, St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO, and Branch Office at No. 36, Day Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,
A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society. It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHAS. VOYSEY, London, England.
Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, Weston super Mare, England.
Rev. M. D. CONWAY, London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Professor MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Essays, lectures, and other papers of a thoughtful and liberal character; editorial articles; foreign and domestic correspondence; book reviews and notices; communications, selections, and other miscellaneous matter; in short, whatever can best promote the general cause to which THE INDEX is devoted will be found regularly in its columns.

Also, a highly interesting RATIONALISTIC STORY, entitled "PAUL GOWER," is now appearing serially in THE INDEX, and will run during the year.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial. All MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS must be addressed to

THE INDEX, Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

A FINE RADICAL ROMANCE!

TO BE PUBLISHED

THE INDEX FOR 1873.

WE ARE HAPPY TO ANNOUNCE that we have secured for publication in THE INDEX a most excellent novel, entitled

PAUL GOWER:

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

For the present the author desires to withhold his name. But he is well known in literary circles as a writer for the best English and American magazines. Of another story written by him Mr. JAMES PARTON says: "I consider it a master-piece of narrative." Mr. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, who was so kind as to read "PAUL GOWER" in manuscript with special reference to its publication in THE INDEX, permits us to publish the following:—

"I have looked over Mr. ———'s novel, and think it would be an attractive feature in THE INDEX. It is very strong, and I found it very interesting. The story is remarkably well told; the characters are firmly drawn; and the religious tone of it will suit the paper well. The style is nervous and simple; the incident is varied; the development is natural. The writer has put a vast deal of thought into it, and spent great labor on it with admirable effect. My judgment may be at fault, but I think it would adorn THE INDEX. It will divide well as a serial, which will be an advantage."

A series of these Baths will relieve, if not cure, nearly every form of disease. The beauty and simplicity of their action consists in the perfect adaptability, either mild or powerful, of this method of treatment to each and every case. It cleanses the body, purifies the blood, and equalizes the circulation, thus arousing dormant functions, and restoring the highest measure of health possible to the individual.
Innumerable references can be given to cases cured by the Bath, and the proprietor will freely advise with those who desire any information regarding its proper use.
First-class rooms and board at moderate prices.

Moral Light and Darkness.

A SERMON PREACHED IN ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, JANUARY 28, 1872.

BY THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY.

"And God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light."—GENESIS I. 5.

In this gem of early Hebrew poetry, the simple grandeur of which is universally acknowledged, we may find, I think, an emblem of what has taken place in the moral world. Although analogy is not proof, and should never be pushed too far, we may sometimes obtain by its means a clearer insight into the true nature of things than we can get by mere dry reasoning.

We notice first that light is something positive, whereas darkness is only the absence of light; just as heat is a positive, cold only a negative, the absence of heat. Light and heat are realities; darkness and cold are not. Could we suppose ourselves to be transferred during sleep to a perfectly darkened chamber, as we lay still at the first moment of waking we could not possibly know by what objects we were surrounded. We could not tell whether we were alone or in the company of others, we could not tell for certain a single fact about the size or shape of the room, where the door or windows were placed, what furniture if any might be there. Even to a person long accustomed to light and eyesight and hearing, there could be no certainty on any one of these points. All would be pure conjecture, unless he began to rise and move about the room, groping with hands, and thus calling in the aid of the sense of touch, which is so invaluable an organ to the blind. So long I say as he remained still, he could discern nothing. But now let us suppose a faint streak of light to enter the chamber; very faint indeed. This would only illuminate, and that very feebly, the few objects on which it fell; leaving the rest of the contents of the room, and the holes and corners, in almost total obscurity. He sees in fact in proportion to the light which has been allowed to enter the room. If the light be gradually increased, he not only sees more objects, but sees them more distinctly. Two pieces of furniture which at first were mistaken for one, are now seen to be separate; the very size of objects becomes more correctly perceived, as well as their more delicate outlines of shape and shades of color. In fact, the more light which shines up to the degree which the human eye can make use of, the more true and accurate is the observer's perception of the objects by which he is surrounded. But the most important point of all is that this perception of the objects is in fact the perception of their differences which only the light could possibly reveal. In the darkness all was one uniform, unbroken blank. There was nothing to call an object of sight in the mass of dark space all around. There was not even anything to indicate space. To the eye there was absolute nothingness, if one may coin a word for the occasion. But the light coming in, first by a streak and then by degrees more plentifully, makes objects at first dimly perceptible, and then reveals more and more clearly the difference between one object and another. And the same process would be exactly reversed if the light were to be gradually withdrawn and finally extinguished; only with this important distinction, that the knowledge gained during the presence of light would remain after the light was gone.

Now from a moral point of view, the race of mankind, and every individual belonging to it, has been at one time in a state of total darkness; that is, a state in which all actions, motives, principles, were alike unrecognized and undistinguished from each other—in which the very existence of a moral world was unknown, and of course, therefore, no moral distinction was thought of, much less perceived, between certain modes of action. It may be taken for granted that this total moral darkness continues for longer or shorter periods of early infancy, varying in its duration in the case of each infant according to the moral antecedents of the parents, to their calling forth or not calling forth the sense of duty from the very earliest days of its being. The duration of the darkness may vary also according to the healthy or diseased condition of a child's brain. But whatever may serve to hasten or to retard the entrance of moral perceptions, we must all agree that a state of total moral darkness, a state of complete unmorality, is what we all pass through in the earliest period of our lives. And as with individuals, so also with different races of men, and with the first pair or contemporaneous pairs of the most primitive human beings. Whole races we may well conceive have existed, so far as morals are concerned, in precisely the same moral darkness as that through which we have each and all passed long before we can remember.

The first man could scarcely have had more moral light than that savage who, met by one of our missionaries and being asked what was the difference between good and evil, said: "Me take other man wife—good; other man take my wife—evil." I allude to this view of the earliest stages of humanity, because it seems to me not only most desirable to overthrow the popular theological belief about the original righteousness of Adam and Eve, but also because any scientific opinion, such as we may rely upon as certain or as very highly probable, which may come to us with the sanction of such students of Nature, language, and primeval art as Darwin, Max Müller, and Lubbock,—any opinion I say given on such authority on the subject of primitive barbarism will serve to strengthen the position which I have taken up with regard to moral evil. The order of Nature has been, first darkness; afterwards light. Scarcely a creature is born, or a germ animated into vegetation, but passes through the darkness; begins its life, I ought to say, in the profoundest obscurity, and is only allowed the light when it has become previously prepared for it.

The same order is observable in all branches of human knowledge and skill. First the darkness of ignorance, then the light—the dim twilight of half knowledge and faint, erroneous perceptions; and then the full brightness as it seems to us, because it is the highest yet attainable. Those who know anything truly know that we are only yet in early dawn. Why should not this order be preserved also in the moral world? It is only Orthodoxy with its world upside down, or standing on its own head, that has made us ask the question. Of course it is true also in morals that the darkness came first; that whether we regard the human race collectively, or consider the members of it individually, the state of absolute ignorance of moral distinctions always precedes a knowledge of them; the darkness ever goes before the light. In that primal darkness, if it be total, there can be neither moral good nor moral evil. The wildest savage that God ever made would be perfectly innocent so long as he had no moral sense; and the most perfect angel of rectitude we can imagine, who did not know right from wrong and whose conduct was only right because he could not help it, would not differ morally from that wild savage by a hair's breadth. Both would be equally unmoral. Now if there could be no virtue, no moral goodness, without the perception of the difference between right and wrong; and no guilt, no moral evil, without the same perception, it follows that what produces one produces the other likewise; that the thing which in its earliest action makes men feel wicked and even do wickedly, is the only agent by which men can ever become good, or do what is right.

Now the state of each man's mind with regard to right and wrong being at first a perfect blank, or a total darkness, what is it which acts like the light and to which may be traced both moral good and moral evil? For convenience, I will call it the moral sense. By that term nearly every one will understand the same thing. It is not merely a law or command addressed to us from without, for these do not always impress us with a sense of obligation to keep them. A law or commandment may or may not receive the approval of the inward voice. It is not merely the judgment at which we arrive after calculating our own interests in the matter; for we are sometimes impelled by the moral sense to go dead against our own interests, to risk all in our unknown future and to give up palpable present advantage as well. Nor is it the echo in our own breasts of the public opinion around us; for we sometimes feel bound to fly in the face of that opinion, and, at the certain loss of social privileges which we value, and of friendships more precious still, to do what we feel to be right while every body else thinks it wrong. It is neither law, nor interest, nor regard for public opinion by itself, nor all of them together, which can account for the moral sense. Every one of these and other things too which I have not named have an enormous influence on conduct, have power to alter the light as it shines in each man's heart; to make it bright or dim; to scatter it into every recess in the chambers of his soul, or to confine it to the rigid lines of straight beams and to concentrate it all on some few striking objects; to bring it pure and colorless into the soul, or to make pretty effects by varied color (as men do by staining the windows of their churches) at the expense of truth and power. Yes, indeed; the pure light of the moral sense has been distorted, discolored, disguised, as well as often obscured by the officious art-decorators of human conduct. The priests and ministers on one hand, and the tyrannical arbiters of custom on the other, have dimmed and stained this precious light from heaven. But light from heaven it is. All their windows and drapery together could not make it; could only disguise it and weaken it, or perhaps supply it with more objects in order to multiply the lights and shades. But make it? Never! No; it is born of human nature itself. At the right moment when all is ready for it, when the darkness has brooded long enough to quicken the chaos into inarticulate aspiration, God says: "Let there be light!" and there is light. For the first time the eyes of the human spirit open upon the objects of the moral world and perceive differences undreamed of before. The moral sense, be it strong or be it weak, steady and clear, or made flickering and perverted by the mediums through which it acts, is a part of human nature which was before all law spoken or written; is higher than self-interest, and is victorious over public opinion. Law itself, as framed in words and codes and commandments, is but the child of the moral sense; the expression of the consciences of moral individuals. Self-interest dies in its presence, to yield up crown and sceptre; and regard for public opinion bends like the reed before the storm when conscience bids us stand alone and give defiance to the world. We cannot tell what the moral sense is, any more than we can perfectly analyze any other mental faculty, or define life itself. We only know that explanations of its origin which have hitherto reached us go but a very little way in accounting for its wonderful play and power. It is enough for us to know what it does, to feel how it works, and to tremble before its imperative mandates, in order to be very sure that it is a part of our very nature and not the mere accident of our training or solely the result of civilization.

Whatever be the ultimate cause of it, however, the moral sense is just like the light shining in a dark place. It comes to reveal differences unperceived before; differences only to be described as right and wrong. We see by its light that which we ought to do and that which we ought not to do, at any given time and under any given circumstances, unless it is not clear and strong enough to enable us to determine; in which case the moral sense itself holds its possessor guiltless, whatever alternative he may actually adopt. Its verdicts are neither uniform nor infallible. They depend on the windows and drapery, so to speak, of each man's own circumstances and training. But in one respect they are invariable and infallible. In every man the moral sense urges him to do what he thinks to be right, because it is right or seems to be right. It never says: "Do this because it is wrong." The moral sense never says: "Do this or that because you will gain by it." In other words, the faculty of self-interest in all its forms is perfectly distinct from the moral sense. No sooner does this light shine in one's heart, than our first impulse is to do the wrong thing and to evade the right. The first awakening into moral being is not a pleasant sensation, nor are the first years of moral growth years of happiness and ease. We are called upon to make efforts which seriously tax our energy and to do things most repulsive to our taste. In this disturbance of our repose, moral evil is analogous to pain; our first impulse is to get rid of it, to cease to be tortured by inward conflict. For a long time perhaps the impulses to do what we like overpower the dictates of the moral sense, and the consequence is a succession of guilty acts attended by remorse more or less deep. But in the majority of cases the moral sense prevails at certain points in the line of battle, though seldom in all. It is more rare that a man never outgrows one of his childish sins, never makes a single moral conquest, never takes one step forward in the right direction. Exceptions there certainly are to every rule; but even the worst cases of degeneration of character which ever came under my notice were accompanied with the keenest perception of right and wrong, and the deepest distress and self-reproach. From these one could only learn that if the outward life had been a moral failure, the aspirations after goodness had been all the while growing more intense; and perhaps under new conditions these worst of sinners would become the noblest of saints. In a moral point of view the man who feels himself to be a slave, to be tied and bound with the chain of sin from which he cannot release himself, is in a really higher condition than one who, not having done anything half so wicked, is yet quite unconscious that he needs any amendment. No one indeed could be so low in the moral scale as the man whose conscience has never upbraided him at all. Such an one would be next of kin to an idiot or a madman. All this goes to prove that whether the first visible effects of the moral sense be sin or virtue, we must regard the possessor of it as in a higher state than he could have been without it. To wake up to the conviction of being a sinner, to know that one has failed in duty and done wrong, is not to fall but to rise; not to suffer deterioration but to gain an incalculable advantage. It is in fact a passing out of darkness into heavenly light. If we set the smallest value on civilization, on harmonious intercourse between members of one family, of society in general, of a nation, and between nations with each other; and if we value the blessings of peaceful commerce all over the world,—let us remember that every one of these blessings had its rise in the dawning of the light of conscience first upon one or two individuals and then upon whole tribes and peoples of every clime and tongue.

Taken with all its perversions, distortions, and corruptions, the moral sense has been the savior and redeemer of mankind; will continue to save and redeem it from savagery and animalism till the world has outgrown and forgotten the first errors of its childhood. But it is only reasonable to expect that in this early stage of our being every aspiration must be attended with more or less failure and disappointment. See how the tender infant stretches its tiny arms and hands right and left to lay hold of the food which it craves. How perfectly futile are these efforts; how wild and ill-regulated and therefore how vain are these impulsive movements! But though they avail not one iota to secure what he desires, yet he is thereby strengthening his frame for useful work in time to come and exercising faculties which would never be developed at all but for these early, fruitless, and apparently mispent exertions. He grows older, and aspires to walk. What is the result? Never yet in the history of man did baby walk at the first attempt without a fall. We all fall as a matter of certainty; and fortunately too, for otherwise the strain upon the muscles when they are feeble and unused to the work would ruin them for life, if it were kept up a moment longer than the muscles could bear. This is why we fall, and why no one ever regrets or weeps over the first infantile failures. And I believe it is precisely the same in the moral life. We have an aspiration to do right coming to us in the shape of the voice of conscience, and at the first effort to obey it we fall down as a matter of course and do wrong instead; or if we succeed in walking uprightly for a step or two, we soon tire and succumb before the strain of unaccustomed moral effort. I should as soon complain that we were not born full-grown men and women at once, instead of being born infants and growing up gradually to manhood, as charge God with error or indifference for having made our moral life and development analogous to the physical. Men and women entering at once into moral perception without the antecedents of previous moral evil and imperfection would, if they could be made at all, be unnatural, monstrous, and devoid of permanent moral qualities; far more displeasing to the highest human taste than those rarely precocious children who talk and act like grown men, and who either die early in consequence, or grow up to be little better than fools. Everything is lovely in its season, even the infant's awkward and futile muscular plunges, and the child's babbling of bad grammar and broken pieces of words.

But the failings and imperfections of infancy and childhood are only lovely because we know they are reasonable and also fleeting; and the hope that our little ones will grow up to be men and put away childish things, not only reconciles us to their present little follies, but also calls up a peculiar satisfaction with the several stages of their growth, as they come on in succession. If we rightly call him Father, who has appointed every pathway of human progress within and without, can we deny to him some such delight as we parents feel in beholding the successive stages of the growth of his children? And if we do not hesitate to grieve and disappoint our little ones, taking refuge in the warmth of our love and in the confidence of our good purposes, shall we not more readily conceive of him as taking the divinest pleasure in the needful discipline he imparts to us; unmoved by our childish complaints, because he loves us more than we love ourselves, and as beholding with a calm satisfaction the disturbance of our whole being at the entrance of his light into our souls, because he knows—with the certainty of God—that all things are working together for our good, and that the new light which has created all this disturbance of our repose and quickened us into activity and aspiration can never again be extinguished, never again be overpowered by moral darkness and chaos, but shall "shine more and more unto the perfect day."

(Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1873, by P. K. ASHOR, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.)

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XVI.

ESTHER FRANKLIN.

It was definitely settled that as soon as Paul's health was re-established and spring had come—for his grandparents entertained old-fashioned ideas of the perils of a winter's voyage across the Atlantic—he should bid them farewell. He might have urged a speedier departure but for a personal reason; the delay would insure the company of his friends, Dick Sabin and Harry Franklin; who, he knew, had agreed to embark for New York about the time proposed. That is to say, though the latter was as eager to leave England as Paul himself, his cousin's indolence in earning the money necessary for emigration, or prodigality in spending it, rendered such a postponement inevitable. In fact Richard had talked of getting ready for any time during the last six months, and being quite assured of his capacity to do it in a couple of weeks, whenever he chose to apply himself, naturally procrastinated until, as he acknowledged, "it was likely to be a toss-up" whether he shouldn't have to borrow from his intended fellow-voyagers, to pay his passage. Hence Harry had consented to wait till March or April, as the latest date for their projected departure; and hence Paul's willingness to comply with the wishes of his grandparents.

In the meantime it may be easily surmised that, in his present state of mind, he was quite ready to accept Mr. Blencowe's invitation, directly the doctor gave him permission. At the first mention of Northamptonshire in winter, that gentleman demurred a little, and suggested that he should have recommended a warmer latitude; but as it was clearly the ex-invalid's only chance of a holiday; and, as he really incurred small danger so long as he adopted ordinary precautions, the welcome assent soon warranted the journey. Mr. and Mrs. Gower offering no objection (for sickness and indolence had virtually emancipated their grandson from their control), Ruth had the satisfaction of writing to her guardian announcing her speedy return, and presently of carrying off her brother with her into the country.

It was his first visit to Thorpe Parva at this season of the year; and the circumstances under which it was paid, as well as his condition, rendered him peculiarly sensitive to its influences. To get away from town, with all its harassing, miserable, humiliating recollections was, in itself, a great relief and happiness; and how much more so when he was going to a place the associations of which were of the unmixedly delightful character described in a former chapter. Then he could not but reflect that he re-visited it for the last time for some years, perhaps forever. As the "fly" which conveyed him and his sister from the station and town of — rattled along the hard high road, on a clear, frosty afternoon in December, the well-remembered yet unfamiliar landscape, lighted up by the fitful beams of an early declining sun, seemed at once to smile a welcome and farewell. There was a suggestion of this in the sound of the echoing hoofs of the horses; in the wind that swept over the bare fields and through the hedges, shook the skeleton branches of the wayside elms and congealed the waters of the distant, willow-fringed stream (at which he had been used to bathe in summer) into ice. When they dashed down the once green lane, past the Hall, and round the corner of the low stone wall, by which you approached the ivy-clad church and trim vicarage, Paul's heart was so full that, what with his weakness from recent illness and present sentiment, it almost ran over at his eyes. There are but few Englishmen so unfortunate as to be destitute of affection towards their own beautiful country; and Paul had fed his patriotism with the fancies of its poets and fictions of its novelists, until he felt more than the average of anticipatory regret at the thought of parting. And, naturally, he identified much of this kind of sensibility with the spot where he had been happiest. Mr. Blencowe, who came bustling down the box-bordered walk in a great state of interest and excitement, on the stopping of the carriage, attributed his visitor's emotion to debility and the fatigue of the journey, and was anxious to get him in-doors, out of the cold. The old clergyman had very little idea of Paul's love for the small village in Northamptonshire.

The incidents of his sojourn were as simple and uneventful as usual; and, but for its bearing upon his future fortunes, the visit might have been omitted from this narrative altogether, or left to the reader's imagination. He went abroad with Ruth in the clerical basket-carriage, when the weather permitted; took walks, made calls, read, dozed, and ate and slept prodigiously. It was almost worth while being ill to have such an appetite—and the means of satisfying it. Mr. Blencowe (who attached no small degree of importance to his meals, himself) said it did him more good than his dinner-pills, to see Paul use his knife and fork. The old gentleman was very kind and hospitable to him; indeed, more so than ever, partly out of good-nature and commiseration for his lot in being obliged to leave England for the United States—a country of which he entertained the very worst opinion, having somewhere heard that its constitution contained no public, official recognition of a Supreme Being; wherefore he had no doubt of its ultimate ruin and destruction—and partly, Paul could not help observing, from a desire to secure his concurrence in retaining Ruth. For though their father had written a very cordial and friendly letter, deferring almost indefinitely to the clergyman's proposition, and even thanking him for the kindness which suggested it, Mr. Blencowe was not quite satisfied. The bare fact of the existence of the paternal claim sufficed to render him uneasy. In short he had led such a comfortable, prosperous, feather-bed life, that he was prone to borrow a little trouble occasionally, and torment himself about imaginary or distant evils. Wherefore he was at the pains to hold forth to Paul, on all convenient opportunities, on the great loss everybody at Thorpe Parva would sustain if Ruth quitted it; how she was morally certain to suffer in health, and perhaps decline and die, if transferred to the semi-tropical climate of Louisiana (which, on the other hand, would be sure to agree with her brother), and much more to the same purpose. Paul laughed at the old gentleman's transparent cunning, wondered that, at his age, it never seemed to occur to him that a few years might end all his earthly anxieties, and liked him for his affection for his sister. He had long known that he himself was quite a secondary consideration.

Of course he renewed his intimacy with his intended ship-mate, Harry Franklin, for whom he entertained a friendship dating back to his first knowledge of Thorpe Parva, and cordially reciprocated by the young farmer. Their dispositions were not dissimilar, and their mutual discontent with home and its petty tyrannies, and aspirations towards independence, formed a common bond of sympathy. They both loved books and poetry; and, indeed, had both tried their hands at the latter, communicating the results in a correspondence, which embraced all sorts of topics, literary, theological, and personal—nearly every thing but their respective love-affairs (if that term may be applied to Harry's undivulged passion for his friend's sister), of which, however, they were fully cognizant. Some of their effusions had even appeared in the Poet's Corner of the — Guardian; Harry's being of a thoughtful, not to say melancholy, tendency, while Paul had supplied "To R—, on her Birthday;" "A Request for a Lock of Hair;" "A Lover's Remonstrance;" "The False and the True;" &c. &c.—all ringing the changes on his enthrallment and its contingencies. Perhaps it was Harry's diffidence which withheld him from committing himself so openly; perhaps the knowledge that Miss Gower would see his productions, and a dread of her criticism; for she had, more than once, spoken impatiently of Paul's verses, and had her own, personal reasons for being embittered towards such sentimental considerations. She knew, also, that Harry Franklin worshipped the very ground she trod on, and rather resented that fact than pitied him, thinking him merely a shy, sensitive, reserved young man, whose social position put him quite out of the pale of eligibility. For Dick Sabin's reflections on the peculiar self-esteem cherished by the small gentry of England are by no means without foundation; and, as has already been intimated, Ruth was not superior to the influences by which she had, almost from her birth, been surrounded.

The person to whom Miss Gower expressed the unfavorable opinion of her brother's rhymes above alluded to (who wondered at her severity and thought the productions in question beautiful) was Harry's sister Esther, a young woman already mentioned in the course of this story, who must now, as a not unimportant character in it, be introduced to the reader. Always the best of friends to Paul as well as his sister, a kind of virtual confidant of his passion for her cousin Kate (who had told her all about it, and was, indeed, generally communicative, not to say boastful, on the subject), Miss Franklin's presence rendered the old farm-house very agreeable; especially as the temporary absence of her stepmother relieved her, together with the rest of its inmates, from the restraint ordinarily imposed upon their goodness and hospitality. For that objectionable woman (who had not been slandered by Harry, in his conversation with Dick Sabin) had gone to Warwickshire, in company with her son, Mr. Pennethorne; being moved to the journey by the news that an old bachelor brother of hers was ill and likely to die; wherefore it became necessary to look after his testamentary and spiritual dispositions, with respect to which she entertained the gravest apprehensions. And there both of them remained during the whole of Paul's visit, to the extreme satisfaction of everybody. In fact, the Franklins had never been so happy since her first disastrous appearance among them.

Miss Esther, then, at nineteen, her present age, was unusually tall for her sex, being full five feet, seven inches in height and, like her brother, slender of figure and rather thin; having, as the phrase is, outgrown her strength and, besides, suffered in health and spirits from the execrable temper of her stepmother; but she only wanted plumpness to have been exactly symmetrical and, indeed, so charmingly proportioned that nobody but the hypercritical or malicious would have taken exception to her stature. She was neither gawky nor scraggy, but had shapely arms, a dainty waist, and very pretty, slender hands and feet, though the former were reddened by hard work, and the latter, during her school-days, had regularly carried her, five times a week, from Thorpe Parva to—and back (over three miles each way), and therefore obtained plenty of development. Moreover she walked erect, with an easy, natural grace, quite unlike most country girls, who commonly hobble on their heels, or are flat-footed. Her eyes were brown, neither too large nor too small, but wonderfully kind and earnest-looking, beneath shining, black, arched eyebrows. Her hair, of the same color, or near it, was so luxuriant that, had it been released from the modest bands which confined it, it would have reached below her waist. I cannot say that her nose belonged to any recognized order, but only spite could have called it a snub; she had rather a large and therefore expressive mouth, and white if not perfectly regular teeth. In conclusion, she was more sunburnt than fair, a little subject to freckles in summer, and, generally, such a fine, kindly, wholesome-looking country lass that you were instantaneously prepossessed in her favor; which good opinion materially increased upon acquaintance.

I am afraid, however, that she will cut but a homely figure when I come to speak of her education and accomplishments; nevertheless the truth must be told. She could neither dance nor play upon the piano, nor talk better English than most farmers' daughters, and had, besides, a little—just a little—rusticity of accent, savoring of the speech of antiquity. She had read but few books, and, very likely, would have preferred the poetry of Mr. Tupper to that of Mr. Tennyson. She was not clever or brilliant in conversation, rather deficient in self-assertion, and the last person in the world to set herself up for a heroine or paragon. Yet I question if you would not have preferred her to hundreds of young ladies whom she supposed were her superiors and who, themselves, would never have dreamed of admitting her even to the honor of a comparison.

Imprints, then, if she could not play on the piano, she could sing, and had been gifted by nature with such a sweet, kind, harmonious voice that it was music enough in itself, without accompaniment; while it may be questioned whether her inability to perform those dreary instrumental "pieces" which are only too common in middle-class England was not a positive advantage. Then, though she knew but little of books, she could not be considered ignorant or uninformed, especially as regarded her domestic duties, for which she had a capacity amounting to genius, transacting them with a natural fitness and spontaneous grace which seemed to turn the meanest of household affairs "to favor and to prettiness." Whether in the dairy, the poultry-yard, the kitchen, or the parlor, she always appeared equally at home and in perfect harmony with surrounding circumstances. As clever a needle-woman as her cousin Kate, she made all her own dresses and bonnets; while in practical good sense, integrity, and real depth of character she was certainly her superior; besides being entirely free from her cardinal sins of vanity and coquetry. She would not have known how to flirt, would Esther, had she possessed any inclination thereto. Nurtured in what had been, until her father's second marriage, the kindest nest of a home in the world, the girl had grown up as unsophisticated as she was good, to be schooled into a higher capacity for helpfulness and self-devotion, as well as suffering, by the bitter discipline of a shrew's tongue. She inherited the gentility of temperament of the Sabin family from her dead mother (old John's sister, be it remembered), bettered by feminine earnestness and unselfishness. When I have added that she entertained an unusually strong affection for and high opinion of her brother—as was evinced by her resolution to ultimately share his fortunes—I shall leave the rest of Miss Franklin's attributes to be developed in the course of this history.

Naturally the impending emigration of Paul and Harry drew the two friends nearer together, and made Esther feel kinder than ever towards both of them; wherefore it followed, as a matter of course, that scarcely a day passed without Paul's dropping in at the farm-house, as freely as if he had been one of the family; though Ruth's visits were less frequent and more ceremonious. Not that she timed them religiously to a certain hour in the afternoon, was always shown into a severely kept parlor where Esther (after running up stairs to put on her best dress) went through a sort of cut-and-dried conversational formula about the weather, the crops, and the neighbors—as is commonly the case in the country, when a clergyman's wife or daughter calls on his parishioners; but position is position, and as we have before had occasion to observe, nowhere more curiously defined and habitually recognized than in rural England. And though Miss Gower had a great regard for Miss Franklin—indeed, a sincere friendship—she was fully aware of her own social importance, and not the kind of young lady to make herself too familiar with anybody.

The circumstance that the father of the brother and sister virtually ignored his son's intention of leaving his native country and tacitly discouraged all reference to it—on the principle of the proverbial ostrich's hiding his head in the sand—inevitably imparted something of a confidential nature to the talk of the young people, whom he did not, in other respects, interfere with. A great, hearty, sturdy bluff-looking farmer, over six feet high and bulky in proportion, Miles Franklin furnished a good illustration of the significant truth how little a merely healthy, easy-going animal nature can hold its own against a constitutionally selfish and domineering woman whose creed and disposition alike rendered her tormentor of the household; and who was, as her step-son has informed us, morally incapable of kindness or justice. Having drifted into marriage—principally through a connection originating in business relations with her son, on whom he had contracted an unlucky habit of calling, when he went to—on market-days, and so gradually succumbed to brandy-and-water and the widow Pennethorne—he endured the penalty of his folly with no more remonstrance than an occasional attempt at a joke or reflection on the sex, commonly getting out of the way as much as possible—too often in the direction of the village tavern. However, at present, Mrs. Franklin's absence relieved him of the necessity of seeking this resource, and deprived the landlord of the "Hare and Hounds" of some profit; as, during her sojourn in Warwickshire, her husband was content to smoke his pipe and drink his one or two glasses of British or foreign spirits by his own fireside, subsequently retiring to bed with great regularity at nine o'clock, and leaving the hearth to Esther, Harry, and sometimes Paul, who would sit up (if) midnight or later, conversing about America.

I do not know whether Paul was more relieved at discovering that Miss Franklin had heard nothing of the catastrophe at Newman Street and consequently of his humiliation, or disappointed because she could afford him no news of Kate's behavior afterwards, and how she had been affected by his illness; but such were the facts. There was an irregular correspondence between the cousins, but Kate had either not written of late or, what is as likely, avoided the subject; while Esther's other friend, Ruth Gower, thought the affair too discreditably to her brother to mention it, especially as she had only arrived at the knowledge through his own involuntary confessions. Esther, therefore, supposing the relations between the pair the same as ever, ventured a few innocent allusions to them, which were as gall and worm-wood to Paul, until Harry, his confidant, told her what had occurred; when she was very sorry and sympathetic, and shocked at Kate's perfidy. She had always sided with Paul in the many talks she had had with her cousin about him, admired his letters (considerately exhibited to her) and wondered at Kate's cruelty and coquetry. Kate laughed at her reprehensions, regarding them in the light of compliments, and thinking her a good-natured but very simple girl—of course her inferior in accomplishments and understanding. She was not the only person who has patronized her betters and plumed herself on her own selfishness, mistaking it for strength of character.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

I ask the common question, "What is THE INDEX without Abbot?" True, I can see that the paper could be run; that another might edit it, and that the enterprise could possibly be carried forward with a degree of success. But that is not what we want. THE INDEX has grown up around and out of Abbot. It is his offspring, and we want to see him conduct it to its manhood, at least. That thought is primary, and should modify and control all else. I feel sure that no mere divergence of opinion as to the business management should displace Mr. Abbot from the position of master of THE INDEX. We want him there, and no one else.

But the case as now presented is involved in difficulties. Let us see if there is not a short cut out of them.

I set aside at once all speculation looking to a compromise. Nothing can be patched up that will hold together better than the experiment just tried, which has so signally failed. I propose then that THE INDEX be transferred, body and soul, back to Mr. Abbot. Let him have it; let him own it; let him assume the responsibility and conduct it. To whom does it belong if not to him?

I take for granted, of course, that no one of all the present company of stockholders has any speculative pecuniary interest in the concern. They took stock in the idea Mr. Abbot pledged his paper should represent. They desired to help him and not themselves to run a paper. This being the case, I doubt not all concerned would cheerfully waive any claim for funds already paid in, and the greater part would pledge themselves to contribute their yearly ten per cent. payments as a donation, assuming no other responsibility. I respectfully and earnestly commend this suggestion to the consideration of the stockholders. If they would at once signify their disposition in the matter to THE INDEX, and let their communications promptly appear there, it seems to me that the true solution of the vexed question could be speedily and satisfactorily arrived at.

Besides those who are already subscribers to the stock, there are many I doubt not who would be glad to contribute smaller or larger sums, according to their means. I have heard of some who declined to take stock because they would not make themselves liable for the debts of the concern. Here is a chance for all such to act, and set their own limit to their responsibility. Towards such a fund which shall place THE INDEX entirely in Mr. Abbot's hands, with means to run it, I will contribute $100, to be paid in yearly instalments of $25 each.

A CARD.

Under existing circumstances, it is thought best to reduce THE INDEX temporarily to its former size. At the meeting of the Board of Directors on March 13th, it was voted that "the editor be instructed to get released from his engagements with paid contributors to the extent of $1500;" and this action not only renders impossible the fulfilment of the promises made to the public in the "Prospectus of THE INDEX for 1873," but also defeats the chief object of the recent enlargement of the paper; namely, the securing of contributions from as many as possible of the best minds in the radical ranks. Whether this object can ever again be realized or not, will depend upon the action of the stockholders of the Index Association at their Annual Meeting early in June. Meanwhile we solicit the kind indulgence of the subscribers to the paper, in the hope that it may speedily be restored to its former dimensions.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—All letters sent to this office should be directed to "Drawer 38." This is the only post-office drawer which THE INDEX or the Index Association is responsible for. Any other direction of letters would take them into somebody's private drawer. In addressing the business department, write "Business Manager of INDEX, Drawer 38;" or the editorial department, write "Editor of INDEX, Drawer 38."

A. E. MACOMBER, } Executive Committee
 F. E. ARBOT, } of the Index Association.

We have on hand many communications for THE INDEX, some of which are quite valuable. We hope to be able to use all these before long, and in the meantime ask the patience of the writers.

We trust that no true friend of THE INDEX will, in this emergency, withdraw his support in any way from the paper. Rather continue it with unabated and even increased measure, in the great hope that all will yet be well.

Let not any enemies of free religion triumph in their anticipation of the downfall of THE INDEX. The sun of THE INDEX has not yet set! Only a few clouds at present obscure its brightness. We believe it will yet shine forth with rays strong and increasingly mighty, to pierce the fog-banks of superstition and error and melt them all away. If not THE INDEX, then it will be something else to do this. The cause cannot spare—it will not spare—either the journal or the man!

Mrs. C. A. Dall, of Boston, writes us that Mr. Morse, in referring to her three lectures recently delivered before the Second Radical Club, did her injustice in attributing to her the use of certain sharp language in reference to particular opinions and the holders of them. She says that before beginning her lectures she remarked: "I am not going to criticize individuals, and if I find it anywhere asserted that I have, I shall be both grieved and astonished." It is enough that so brave, faithful, and efficient a reformer as Mrs. Dall is and long has been should strive only to be candid, just, and truthful, without taking to herself any anxiety if others think she has been severe in her statements. The public have no business to overhaul and blinder the honest reformer, with demands for apologies, every time he squarely levels his words at their falsities and follies. Let those flutter who are hit. Knowledge, veracity, and sincerity,—these only have we a right to require of the public teacher; and these we are sure cannot be denied to our friend Mrs. Dall.

THE WORTH OF AN IDEAL.

Life is poor without a grand ideal hanging like a star in its highest heaven. Without that, half the inspiration possible to us never comes. Without that, the deep significance of life fails to appear. The "new birth" consists in getting sight of the ideal that overshines and outflashes the actual. When once seen, the universe wears a new face, existence becomes a divine boon, the soul swells with high desires, destiny waits on our steps, the mortal becomes immortal!

No service so signal can be rendered to any young man or woman, by any teacher, philosopher, friend, or guide, as to cause to rise on the horizon of their life a thought, an idea, a vision, which changes the entire ordinary course of their living and lifts all their hopes and plans and aims to a higher level. In New England, thirty years ago, Ralph Waldo Emerson did this for the young men of that day, and Margaret Fuller did it for the young women. It was a new gospel these two great souls preached—a gospel which the churches somehow seemed wholly unqualified to produce. New England owes a large part of its very best culture, intellectual and spiritual, to the influence which streamed from these radiant minds. The idealism which they taught was the deep blush of conscious soul mantling the cheek of hard Puritan theology and Yankee worldliness. A sweeter, purer, nobler life found its fountain-head in the inspiration they felt and gave, which has flowed out into the country through many channels all these years since.

And to-day we need a revival of true idealism, which shall not be vague and misty, but which shall take the hand of truescence and walk into the minds and hearts of our people. A so-called "revival of religion" does not answer; we want a revival of intelligence, a revival of conscience, a revival of desire for the best possible thought and life. We want an ideal which the churches are too effete to generate and too contracted to contain; an ideal which shall re-fashion all our institutions, infusing into them a purer spirit and a nobler aim.

But when we have opened our eyes on such an ideal, we must be faithful to it if we would keep it. Some there are—many indeed, we trust—who have caught a glimpse of the real Better and Best, who are striving to attain to these, to develop the perfect out of their imperfect. But it is a slow and difficult work. There are many things to hinder and to obstruct. The world moves tardily towards the brighter age; truth finds the walls of error thick, and reason discovers that superstition and folly are long-lived foes. Men disappoint us with whom we had coöperated and in whom we had put high faith; causes for which we had earnestly labored and freely sacrificed languish and threaten to fall on our hands; exigencies and crises occur which demand of us, even in the face of discouragement, greater toil and larger sacrifice and further commitment of vital hopes and interests. Altogether we are sometimes led to say: "What boots it thus to try to right wrongs, to correct errors, to straighten out entanglements, to advance the cause of truth and right? Why fly in the face of the world's obstinacy and stupidity and folly and selfishness; why not conform, or let alone, or retire?"

But there is the ideal over-shining the actual! That shames us if we are false and unfaithful! We must be true to that, or where is our self-respect, our honor, our integrity, our manhood? Rich we can never be with the poor actual; poor we can never be with the rich ideal. Content and happy will we be, though lonely and shunned, though over-clouded by defeat and disaster, if we have been constant to the right and loyal to the highest revealed to us. Let us not lose our faith and courage too easily. Let our disappointment go not one step in advance of the hard facts, to apprehend something worse beyond. Let rather our trust stand on tip-toe peering over the rim of evil, full of expectancy to see the on-coming good. If there is a God, he surely sides with the right; and his side wins. But God or no God, the Universe at least is honest and sound at heart; its laws are full of integrity and cannot be broken: no bad man can wrest them to his bad mind. The Ideal is above the actual. Let it ever invite, allure, and command us!

LIBERAL LEAGUES.

It is not from any lack of sympathy with the Liberal League movement that the Editor of THE INDEX has decided for the present to omit the article headed "Organize," hitherto kept standing on the first page. Many reasons render this course advisable, and I entirely concur with him in this as in other matters. In accordance with his wish, however, I hope to prevent the subject of Liberal organization from falling out of notice, believing as I do that organization is the one thing now most necessary to the progress of the radical cause. The present movement is spreading far more widely than is indicated by the brief list of Leagues hitherto reported to THE INDEX.

For instance, Mr. E. G. Blaisdell, of Vineland, New Jersey, has just enclosed to me a copy of a printed Call, signed by thirty-one citizens of the place, summoning a "Mass Meeting of the Liberals of Vineland" to convene in Plum Street Hall on March 25; and he adds: "We shall undoubtedly organize upon the basis of your 'Demands of Liberalism,' and adopt the Constitution which you propose, with slight modifications. You will perhaps recognize Mr. and Mrs. Bristol as old friends in your cause, as old subscribers at least; and we hope to bring all our best citizens of Vineland into full accord with your noble and earnest appeal." The Call is excellently framed, and declares that "it behooves all those who profess liberal sentiments, whether Unitarians, Rationalists, Materialists, Spiritualists, or any and all persons of whatsoever shade of belief, constituting the liberal wing of religionists, to organize their forces for the protection of these [religious] rights."

So also Miss J. E. Udell reports a similar movement in Andover, Ohio. A card in the Andover Enterprise states that "in many places the people are arousing themselves and forming Leagues and Sub-Leagues." At the Universalist Church in that town, on February 22, after a lecture by Miss Udell, twenty names were taken at once as members of a League; and a county convention was summoned to meet at Jefferson on March 12, at which the following officers were elected: President, W. H. Crowell; Vice President, J. E. Curtis; Secretary, A. Giddings; Treasurer, E. Wood; Executive Committee, L. B. Crowell, M. A. Giddings, and D. D. Holmes.

Mr. Hudson Tuttle, one of the most influential Spiritualists of the country, writes to me that in Milan, Ohio, where he has lectured for five years, "last Sunday [March 23] several of the most earnest founded a Liberal League with every prospect of success. The deepest interest is manifested, and the hall is filled as never before. The people are awaking to the great danger which threatens freedom of thought." In my opinion the Spiritualists deserve especial credit for their promptness and activity in this movement. When men of so unsectarian a spirit as Mr. Tuttle engage in it, there is no danger that excessive zeal for a special belief will interfere with the breadth and liberality which are essential to success.

In numerous papers, in all parts of the country, I see evidences of the rapid spread of the movement, and I do not doubt that many others fail to come to my notice. It would be a great favor if local friends of organization should send me marked copies of all articles bearing on this subject. It would be also a great favor if lists of officers should be promptly sent in the case of every new League that is formed.

I will close this little article with the following wise words contained in a recent note from Mr. Edward M. Davis, of Philadelphia, one of the most active and best known radicals of the land: "How can people think there is no danger from the idolaters of our country, when they are so many, are so well organized, have so many churches, so much money, and for the sake of their idea of Jesus—an idea held in common by them—will sink all differences? There is danger, and much of it, from our want of organization."

F. E. A.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

The grandest temple of the Israelites in the United States being in want of an English preacher the better to meet the needs of the congregation that assemble within its vast walls, and having sought in vain for some months, a member of the Board of Trustees (if that be the name given to the body in authority) proposed, as a candidate at a recent meeting, the name of a radical preacher,—a free religious man, of local reputation. Whether the suggestion was made in sincerity or in sarcasm, the maker of it alone knows. It seems to have excited neither indignation nor scorn. The chairman very properly declined to entertain it, or present it to the assembled voters, on the sufficient ground that none but an Israelite in faith could officiate as minister in a Jewish temple; and there the matter ended.

But need it end there? The radical Jews are pure theists; and their theism has been almost wholly detached from the mechanical monotheism of the ancient Hebrews. It is as simple and rational as theism can be and retain its substance as an instituted faith. They have set aside most of the ceremonial law, if not all of it; they dispense with technical usages so far that mere shreds and remnants of them are left; they interpret the Scriptures rationally; in their worship the men and women sit together in pews; the use of the Hebrew language is quite incidental in the temple service and is likely soon to be dropped entirely, seeing that it is no longer taught to the children in families and is unintelligible to many of the adults. The radical Jews are connected with their ancestral Judaism by a thread of tradition alone, and that thread is rapidly wearing away by the friction of numberless causes that operate to bring the Israelites into practical sympathy with American civilization and with modern society. Efforts are making among them to abolish the few visible distinctions that remain to separate the Jewish from the Christian community. Even so fundamental a point as the abolition of the Hebrew Sabbath is seriously entertained, and the expediency of observing the Christian Sunday is discussed,—not solely or chiefly on economical grounds, as allowing another day for business, but on general considerations of fellowship with the people whose religious customs prevail in the community. There is a strong dislike of being thought peculiar in things external which is shared by those hitherto regarded as especially peculiar, the people who have been known by their peculiarities; and this feeling is multiplying agreements and diminishing the number of disagreements even in grave matters.

The majority of Jews in this country—certainly in New York—are Germans; but they do not wish to be distinguished as German Jews. The distinction is not socially to their advantage, and many of them are willing to let incidentals go, and are not disposed to increase the list of peculiarities which act as barriers between them and their fellow-citizens. Hence the desire to have an English as well as German preacher in the temple just referred to.

Now what a fine thing it would be, what a splendid innovation, for the worshippers in the temple to declare themselves, what virtually they are—a company of theists; to cut the already invisible cord that binds them nominally to Judaism, and to institute theism as a system of faith in the heart of New York! Nothing but sincerity would seem to be needed for its accomplishment. Superstition has been outgrown. There is no cumbrous theology to be discarded. The rites are already attenuated to the last degree. The idea, the purified idea, remains. Not a step would have to be taken; only the steps that have been taken would have to be acknowledged, and their logical sequences allowed. Then the venerable mother, with fresh garments and a renewed youth, would step on in advance of her slow-footed child and gather into her bosom new generations.

Such a movement as this would command the hearty sympathy and the active coöperation of a great body of people who, having cast off the Christian faith, retain their allegiance to a faith. The Free Religious men are not the only ones who would hail such a movement with joy as answering to a great need, a bridging over an awkward chasm, and as leading boldly into a new land of promise a multitude ready and anxious to leave their Egyptian bondage. Let advanced Jews discard their Judaism—and carry their institution into new territory. There are intelligent and earnest men enough who have discarded Christianity to join them in maintaining a noble theism—that, being neither Hebrew nor Christian, but human, will satisfy the reason and dignify the worship of the best minds. There is no living preacher of a free religion who would not feel honored by an invitation to minister in a temple consecrated to such a faith. The points on which rational believers, whether of Jewish or Christian antecedents, agree are not only more numerous than the points on which they differ, but they are more cardinal. All others in fact are incidental. Each class can give something to the other. Each can give up something for the sake of unity. The chest behind the speaker's desk will hold all the bibles; so that the old one of the Hebrews will be in goodly company, and in fresh regard by modern people will find compensation for the hospitality it exercises. The old faith will furnish for the new a historical basis; the new faith will supply the old with modern life.

"GO, AND SIN NO MORE."

The story of Jesus and the woman taken in adultery, as all scholars know, is an interpolation in the text. As it is found in only one of the Gospels, and not in the oldest manuscripts of that Gospel, there is no reason for believing that the event as recorded ever happened. Still, the majority of Christians accept it as gospel truth, as genuine and authoritative as the Sermon on the Mount. Illustrations of the event, of the persecuting crowd, the compassionate Jesus, and the humiliated, perhaps penitent woman at his feet, hang up in conspicuous places in hundreds of Christian homes; while these magic words are daily used to shut the mouths of merciless condemners of men through all Christendom, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." We are told that if this story is not, strictly speaking, "gospel," that it is good enough to pass as such; and that after all we may believe that it is not improbable that somewhere, sometime, Jesus did say something like these words to somebody. Well, grant it are they altogether wise words?

Ought he not to have condemned her? Is adultery such a light offence that we should simply dismiss the offender—man or woman—with a gentle, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more"? Is not such amiable treatment of criminals weakness rather than wisdom? Jesus was not called upon to condemn her to be stoned to death according to the laws of Moses; that power belonged alone to the civil judge. Perhaps, too, there were palliating circumstances in that special case, which made such tender treatment politic and wise. But looking at it from the standpoint of a modern judge trying the case of a modern adulteress, we should say that it would have been wiser if Jesus had rebuked the woman for her great sin; had condemned her, and then turned to the Pharisees and denounced the extreme severity of their laws against adultery. But he simply said to the woman: "I do not condemn thee; go and sin no more." And for aught we know she danced off to join her sisters in the "thrifty vice," singing over her good luck at her last escape, and fully resolved, not to reform—oh no!—but to look out sharp for the police next time.

And there seems a good deal of romance in the other part of the story. The Pharisees, it is said, were "convicted by their conscience," when he said to them: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast the stone at her." Some of them were rakes, perhaps; but were they all guilty of adultery? His answer was admirably adapted to teach others mercy and compassion in dealing with such criminals, but it taught them also to let go scot free everybody, unless they could find somebody "without sin" to inflict the deserved punishment. Was there nobody in that crowd sensible enough to reply: "I am not sinless; but I have yet to learn that a man must be perfect before he can condemn a woman taken in adultery. My duty now is to vindicate the law, and I am prepared to do so." We think the Pharisees with some show of reason might have condemned Jesus for letting an adulteress go so entirely uncondemned.

And we have often wondered why Jesus did not make some inquiries about the man taken in adultery. He seems to have overlooked him, as too many do to-day. We can condemn the woman severely enough perhaps; turn her into the streets and drive her into the brothel, and then drop a tear of pity for the poor "unfortunate;" but the man—we can make him a general, send him abroad as foreign minister to represent us, invite him to dine with us, permit him to dance with our wife and marry our daughter, and if anybody raises a stone, cry out, "Hold! 'he that is without sin, let him first cast the stone.'"

We think it high time that our judges and juries began to cast a few stones. What do the prostitutes or libertines, the swindlers in Congress and out of it, the bank defaulters, railroad robbers, and murderers care for your sentimental appeal to "go, and sin no more"? Just nothing at all! What this age needs, in place of such mushy sentiment, is justice that executes the law against offenders, and, as Heine said of his enemies, will "forgive them not till after they are hung." Not that we approve of hanging; we think it is, as John Wilkes once said, "the worst use a man can be put to." But we would punish criminals by stoning them to death; that is, by casting them inside of stone-walls, and compelling them to earn their bread and help pay the taxes of the State,—and, we are tempted to say, by taking away the pardoning prerogative of presidents and governors. All that our great criminals fear is punishment. They are perfectly willing to be forgiven. They will bow their heads submissively to your awful sentence of "go, and sin no more;" and then go about their regular business of robbing banks and cutting throats, and thanking God that this is a free country where every man has a right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and one man is just as good as another. But let Stokes, with his brandy and cigars, receiving the sympathy of all the "go-and-sin-no-more" sort of people, know that "killing men with intent to murder" is not exactly the right and proper thing in a Christian community, but a crime whose penalty is death,—and we think that the Stokeses and Fosters will not enjoy the pastime of using men for marks to fire at, or rapping them over the heads with car-books. Thanks to Gov. Dix that he has got some sense as well as sentiment, and has some mercy for society and respect for law! It is well to temper justice with mercy, but not well to take all the temper out of justice in doing it.

We allow "Voices of THE INDEX Constituency" to be heard in our "Communication" department, because we think they have an especial right of expression at this time, when matters are occurring in which they have so vital an interest.

Rabbi Isaacs, of the Forty-Fourth Street Synagogue, in New York, claims to have married 812 couples within the last thirty-five years; not one of which marriages he says was "mixed"—un-Christian every one of them. And, moreover, he says, not one of these couples has ever been divorced. The lesson of this is that marriages which are not Christian, and not "mixed," are quite apt to be permanent.

The N. Y. Herald of March 23 says: "Our latest news is to the effect that Christianity, by an imperial edict, has been promulgated throughout the empire of Japan." This Christianity includes of course the doctrines of the trinity, vicarious atonement, original sin, total depravity, and everlasting punishment. Can we feel very glad that these superstitions have been "promulgated" to our Japanese brethren? In just so far as they receive them, their civilization will be darkened and hindered.

LONDON LETTER.

REV. STOPFORD BROOKE ON THE POET SHELLEY.

LONDON, March 1, 1873.

The Rev. Stopford Brooke, well known as the able and sympathetic biographer of the late F. W. Robertson, is just now exciting considerable attention, and not a little astonishment, by a series of discourses given in his church on Sunday afternoons, upon "Theology in English Poets." The poet whom he has been considering in the last two Sundays was Shelley, and he is to give a third to the same remarkable character. The phenomenon of a clergyman of the Church of England dealing with an atheistic poet, of the extreme heresy brought into the proximity of lawn sleeves, was one that I could not allow to pass unexamined; and so I went to St. James' Chapel, whose congregation is one of the most aristocratic in London, to hear what such a man could make of such a subject. They who are altogether unacquainted with the mind and character of Stopford Brooke may anticipate that poor "mad Shelley"—as his fellow pupils at Eton used to call him—was held up as a bogey, and his sad life, his virtual exile from his native country, his sadder end, were recalled as an instance of the divine judgment upon atheism. How could fire and water—the sea that drowned him, the pyre upon which all of him was burned save that "cor cordium" above which heretical pilgrims hang their chaplets at Rome—purify the name of one who detested the Christian religion? But if any who helped to make up the thoughtful and attentive company which filled Mr. Brooke's church anticipated a piece of unctuous denunciation, they must have been surprised as well as disappointed. The preacher, who has a well-merited fame for eloquence, is a very handsome man of about forty. His look and manner indicate the gentleman and scholar preponderant over the clergyman, before he has opened his lips. He reads his prayers from a little card prepared for the Lent services, and I must confess reads them in a rather wooden way, his voice never rising or falling. The first time that I hear any tone coming from any deep place in the man, is when he reads the lesson, which so touchingly relates the purchase of Macpelah by Abraham as a place for the burial of his dead; here the voice, with its simple and artfully-artless expression, conveyed the full pathos of the little oriental scene. But when from the desk and the lectionary the preacher ascended to the pulpit, he became transformed. There, without taking a text of any kind, without any Bible or Prayer-book dangling the chain by which they held him, he passed at once into communion with the lofty human spirit whom he evoked from his storm-tossed era and set before us in radiant reality. The speaker's manner is most charming. He makes but few gestures with hand or arm, and those of the simplest; for he needs none, with his voice that subtly vibrates with every emotion which fills him, and an eye that passes through every shade, from the almost azure light which beams with the contemplation of a fine poetic idea, to the dark flash with which he opens an abyss for meanness and selfishness. When excited, his voice does not rise, rather it is lowered; his arms do not move, they are even more still; but there is a nervous quivering and quickening of speech, a moving of the head suddenly to one side, as if he saw something in his manuscript too awful to read, or as if the cool reflections in the study had failed to write there any adequate statement of the picture or feeling now controlling him.

The particular discourse to which I propose to devote this letter was introduced with a singular statement concerning Shelley's "personal morality." How can an atheist have any personal morality? The speaker anticipated the question. Shelley was, he declared, in his later life, and so far as he chose to define his belief, rather an ideal pantheist; and, whatever ignorance or bigotry may say, pantheism is not atheism. But even supposing him an atheist, there is no proof that immorality is necessarily linked to atheism. Whether morality follows belief in a God depends upon the character of the God believed in. Belief in the God of some people may tend to immorality,—in a God, for example, who has elected some of us to be saved for his own glory, which leads directly to selfish isolation from mankind; and to believe in a God who has elected others for eternal torment is to trample justice, love, and truth in the dust. Neither theist nor Christian ought to be thought of as moral merely because of a confession of a belief in God. The converse is equally true; the atheist is not immoral merely because he does not confess to belief in a God. At the same time I hold, said the preacher, that the belief in God as a Father, absolutely good, is the strongest and most lasting impulse to morality, particularly as it involves a sense of relationship to our fellow-men. "We converse of God as the Father, Educator, and Lover of all men without exception, and of all men as his sons—unable to divide themselves from him. That conception at once establishes between us and all men the relationship of brothers and of a communion which is bound to be a self-devoting and loving one. It lays a glorious foundation for social, national, and international morality. It intensifies all mutual duties by sending into them the spiritual force of love, and it connects them all with an eternal source of love, which bestows on them the bloom of immortal hope." Shelley could have accepted this faith and kept intact all his ideas as to the moral regeneration of man; but not accepting it he was not thereby immoral. The godless philosophies of man supply almost every motive that the Christian philosophy supplies towards morality; they are eminently reasonable; they do not despise but encourage self-devotion; they too exalt love to the race into the loftiest place as an impulse to morality. As Lord Bacon says: "Atheism leaves to man reason, philosophy, natural piety, laws, reputation, and everything that can serve to conduct him to virtue."

At the same time, the preacher believed that the theoretical atheist is insensibly influenced by the idea of a God under which he is born; and if that idea were utterly blotted out there would follow a gradual lowering of the morality of the race. Then passing to Shelley he described him as surrounded by a general belief that he was immoral while he was not, and was denounced with every opprobrious epithet. This sort of thing never threw him into the immoral life in which Byron took pleasure. After he had poured out a few hot lines of wrath he forgave his enemies, and his life was lived in harmony with a gentle and noble ideal; and with the intensest desire to fulfil his mission for the good and progress of man. At this point Mr. Brooke launched out into a vigorous arraignment of the statute against atheists, demanding that the law should be purged of anything so untrue and unjust. Though obsolete in men's thoughts, the law is by no means obsolete in practice. And if an atheist is entirely conscientious, and will not take an oath in the name of God in a court, he is to his grievous loss put beyond the protection of the law. It seems to me shocking, said the preacher, that such a thing should exist. Christianity needs to be clear of such a wrong.

I must reluctantly deprive your readers of much that was exalted and powerful in Mr. Brooke's discourse; and I have had, especially, to omit much interesting criticism upon this poet and his poetry, deeming the general philosophy of the speaker of greater importance. I conclude with a passage in which that philosophy is blended with a very important and noble estimate of Shelley. The way the poet reaches the perception of the moral virtues, said the preacher, is different from that of the philosopher. The latter reaches them through reason, and Shelley attained that in an unfinished treatise. The former reaches them through emotion, and Shelley reached them through love of man. That was the first thing in his nature, and it was felt with all the strength and all the weakness that belonged to him. It was given form to by the French Revolution, and the form it took was the doctrine of equality. All men were to be equal and free, and, because loving one another as brothers, to be freed from law. To proclaim that good news, he dedicated all his powers. But he did not, like a political philosopher, adopt it because it commended itself to his reason; he made it his own because the idea moved his whole being with the same life-giving, life-moving passion that the breath of spring bestows upon the woods. And then out of it, as goddesses rising from the sea, there arose for his worship—Justice, who bears the light for love, so that the equal rights of men are supported and their equal duties balanced; Truth, so that Wisdom might grow among all men, and with wide-spread wisdom, wide-spread freedom; Purity, so that none should injure others; Forgiveness of injuries, so that man's freedom might remain unstained with blood; Fortitude, Endurance, for these, in nobly bearing woe and wrong, wrought out deliverance from wrong for men; Obedience to Fate, however sore its blows, not in blind submission as a bound to its master, but in indestructible belief in the final victory of good (good always being conceived as greater than that which men call fate); Hatred of all evil, or rather hatred passing into infinite pity for all evil persons, mingled with stern resolution for the pitiless destruction of the evil in them. When out of this long, intense rapture of desire and hope for the equal blessedness of all had arisen the great moral powers of the human heart, and taken up their thrones in the palace of Shelley's heart, he bound them all into one, and—reaching the same point as he reached when he thought of that idea which men call God—named them Love, and said: "Love is the law which shall govern the moral world."

I am sure that it will require no comment from me to impress your readers with the phenomenal and important character that must attach to a discourse such as I have so imperfectly described, delivered by a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England, on Sunday, and in his own pulpit.

VOICES FROM THE INDEX CONSTITUENCY.

DETROIT, March 25, 1873.

MR. STEVENS:

Dear Sir,—As one deeply interested in THE INDEX, I cannot forbear expressing my extreme disappointment at the course pursued by the directors at the late meeting which resulted in the resignation of Mr. Abbot. To me that is the end of THE INDEX, and I say it in no disrespect to those true and able men associated with Mr. Abbot therein. It must be remembered that the paper grew around this man, not that the man was called to the paper.

I believe I express the sentiments of every stockholder in Detroit, when I say that the subscriptions were made solely because the paper was a means of making public Mr. Abbot's ideas. The subscribers here had and still have faith in his heart and his head, and wish the paper to be a vehicle for the expression of both,—not under the supervision or direction, in any particular, of Mr. Butts, or Mr. Cone, or Mr. Bateson, or Mr. Bissell, or any one else. Had the first mentioned of the above-named gentlemen stated, when soliciting subscriptions to stock in THE INDEX in this city, that the paper would be so managed that, in the event of a difference of opinion as to its policy, existing between himself and Mr. Abbot, the latter would have to give way provided he (Butts) could get two or three or even a dozen to side with him, he would not on such a statement have received a dollar, but would certainly have been informed that, so far as the paper was a means of expression for Mr. Abbot, we took an interest in it and no farther; and that while Mr. Butts might be both able and wise we did not know it, and were desirous of giving an opportunity to another man whom we did know to express publicly his thoughts, which are believed to be valuable, on matters we deemed important.

The investments in INDEX stock were not made with a view to pecuniary return. They were made for the furtherance of ideas not supposed to be popular, and for the support of a paper on a plan which of necessity would place money-making as a secondary consideration. It would seem to me that the signers of the business card in the last issue of THE INDEX had reversed this order, and thereby defeated for a time at least the purpose and aim of the paper, and violated the implied conditions on which the stock subscriptions were obtained. Against such action I emphatically protest.

Yours very truly,
T. T. IVINS.

NEW YORK, March 22, 1873.

TO THE "ACTING EDITOR" OF THE INDEX:

The undersigned, contributors to the fund of the Index Association, have read with the deepest regret the action of a minority of its Board of Directors, at their recent meeting of the 13th of March.

The name of Mr. F. E. Abbot is so indissolubly connected in our minds with THE INDEX, that the one without the other seems to be an anomaly. Our subscriptions were made solely upon the bona fide understanding that they would be under the personal control of Mr. Abbot; and if his forced withdrawal from the paper should be final, we should most unwillingly consider ourselves bound by them, and should strongly object to the payment of any further instalments.

We therefore hasten to protest against that action of the Board on the 13th instant, and deem especially worthy of censure their refusal to pass the reasonable resolution of Mr. Abbot asking that the matter might be deferred until it could be laid before a meeting of the entire Board.

We still hope that the resolutions referred to may be reconsidered, by a full Board, and that the talent and integrity of Mr. Abbot may be restored to their connection with THE INDEX.

E. CHRISTERN,
A. HALL,
E. BOCK.

BOSTON, March 24, 1873.

MR. A. W. STEVENS:

Dear Sir,—It is difficult to sit quietly under the outrage to Mr. Abbot; and I believe that his forced retirement, beside being an outrage to him personally, will remove from THE INDEX its chief attraction. I believe with you that when he goes "go also the central intellectual life and light of this journal, that which has given to it its chief power and influence as a great, brave, invincible organ and exponent of radical ideas and convictions; and without him I do not expect or hope that it will continue to be what it unquestionably has been with him." Can nothing be done to recall him? Is there no way in which you can call a special meeting of the Association? I believe that nine-tenths of the shareholders in the Association will be on Mr. Abbot's side.

Very truly in haste,
HENRY K. OLIVER, M. D.

The Christians of this world of ours have from the very earliest period exhibited a peculiar capacity for getting along inharmoniously, which seems to augur ill for the success of heaven as a communistic experiment, and to discredit the possibility of the sunrise of the Millennium ever being seen of mortal eye. One of the latest instances of rival sects fighting like devils for conciliation, hating each other for the love of God, is reported from Vermont. In a town in the southern part of the State, the Methodists and Universalists united in building a church, which the former denomination should occupy in the morning and the latter in the evening. The church was completed, and all went pleasantly for some weeks, till, one fine Sunday morning, the Universalist asked his Methodist brother to announce that the sermon that evening would be on the subject of "The Death of the Devil." The latter—that is the Methodist clergyman—disgusted at this summary taking-off of a Scriptural character exceedingly useful to Orthodox believers as a boggy to frighten sinners into heaven, made the announcement, with a postscript that the occasion would be a somewhat peculiar one, since the funeral sermon of the father was to be preached by the son. The Universalist assigned the disciple of Wesley to the place which, according to Universalism, has no existence; the congregations entered zealously into the dispute, the arm of the law was invoked, the church is about up, a first class suit is in progress, and the only persons who are profiting by the squabble are the lawyers. The Table-Talker is of opinion, therefore, that, if the devil is dead, he has left to those popularly accredited as his sons a rich legacy in the matter of prospective costs and fees.—Chicago Tribune.

A more or less worthy Scotch wife was remonstrated with by her minister for her habit of beating her husband. She explained that her husband's conduct was not at all what it ought to be. The minister recommended kindness and forgiveness, enjoined her no more to use her flats and nails, but to "heap coals of fire upon his head." "Well, minister," replied the now enlightened wife, "since you say so, I'll try the coals; but I may tell you that two or three kettles of boiling water has wrought no improvement."

A little four-year old beset his mother to talk to him and say something funny. "How can I?" she asked. "Don't you see how busy I am baking these pies?" "Well, you might say, 'Charley, won't you have a pie?' That would be funny for you!"

An old lady gave this as her idea of a good man: "One who is keener of his clothes, don't drink aperite, kin read the Bible without spelling the words, and eat a cold dinner on wash-day without grumbling."

THE STATEMENT OF THE

Directors of the Index Association, concerning their controversy with the late editor has been published and a copy mailed to each of the stockholders. If not promptly received, it will be mailed on application. This statement will be mailed to any subscriber of THE INDEX on receipt of stamp to pay postage.

The undersigned has prepared a more complete and detailed statement, expelling the real cause of these troubles, which will also be sent with the above, on application, and stamp to pay postage.

Address,
ASA K. BUTTS,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It emulates some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes.—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and woof of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. The author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is essentially a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1874, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION IMPROVE A PERMANENT FORTITUDE OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUBSTITUTION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Durling, Horace Sauer, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. W. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. W. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—4 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, coarseness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Controversy between Religion and Science.

BY PROF. F. W. CLARKE, OF BOSTON.

From time immemorial, science and religion have seemed to be at war; and thus far science has steadily advanced. Theologians have abandoned many positions which they once deemed essential. To-day, a man may be looked upon as Orthodox, and yet reject the traditions of a literal six days creation, a universal deluge, and a miraculous stoppage of the sun. The great battles at present are over the theories of evolution, the inviolate regularity of natural law, and the differences between mind and matter.

But in spite of the defeats already experienced, many theologians are still pugnaciously inclined. A new theory broached in the scientific world is to their minds a challenge; and, too often without waiting to examine and understand, they run full tilt against it. And they find their chief justification in the statement that material science is universally materialistic in its philosophy, and therefore opposed to all true religion.

Of late years, however, the opinion has generally gained ground that science has nothing to do with religion; that the two travel in entirely distinct paths; or rather, since all truth is one, that they are like the two poles of a magnet, necessary to each other, and yet mutually repulsive. This view is partly correct, but only in part. For example, it is a fundamental question whether mind and matter are distinct and separate entities, or merely different manifestations of one essence. It is plain that before the controversy can be reasonably settled, the evidence of matter must be taken. Matter has much to do in adjusting the balance of probabilities. Physiology can at least say whether, in face of the facts which it is her province to establish, it is possible for an immortal soul to exist; although by admitting the possibility of such an existence she need not commit herself to a belief in it. More than this; supposing the existence of a soul to be clearly demonstrated, even then, although material science may not be able to interpret the laws to which it is subject, she must certainly be consulted in discussing the relations between that soul and the physical universe. All phenomena must be considered before valid conclusions can be reached.

Now, in order that we may understand some of the causes of the clashing between ecclesiastics and men of science, let us look at the various classes of minds with whom the latter have to deal. To begin with, we find in every community, through all grades of society, many persons who are by nature doubters. In spite of interests, friendships, and associations, notwithstanding that they may have been trained from childhood to believe in the wickedness of unbelief, they find themselves unable to accept extraordinary dogmas through mere faith in authority, and question vigorously, though perhaps silently, every doctrine which the churches have to offer. The first misgivings strengthen into doubts, and these receive accretions from many sources. The doubter, whose thoughts have made him to himself both sphinx and victim in one, goes, perhaps, in the first flush of his scepticism, to the churches, hoping that all his difficulties may be plausibly explained. There he sees bigotry and hypocrisy in high places. He hears learned doctors, who profess belief in charity and brotherly love, wrangling like cats and dogs over the most insignificant questions. Blasphemy, masquerading in the garb of prayer, often falls upon his ear. Curses seem louder and more numerous than blessings. And he is threatened with damnation unless he believes with all his heart a dozen contradictory dogmas presented by as many different authorities. He continues to doubt, and no wonder. In his disgust he forgets the good which the churches have done, and overlooks the merit in them at the present day. Their faults seem to him too great to leave room for any virtue. He becomes misanthropic. Doubt develops into unbelief; which, like a weed, flourishes upon the weakest nourishment, yet exhausts the strongest soil. He begins with slight misgivings, and at last disbelieves everything. And then he seeks for absolute certainty, and for confirmation of his own ill-matured opinions, in natural science.

In most cases, the sceptic of this class, seeking to destroy his adversaries at a blow, rushes to the scientist with two or three direct questions. Among others he asks if there be a God, and if the soul is immortal; and demands square, unflinching answers—yes or no. If science does not at once affirm a certainty upon each question, her querist is apt to misconstrue her, and to assume that she utterly rejects all religious notions. But here he goes astray, for upon such points science affirms nothing. If she is unable to prove the existence of a personal Deity, she is equally unable to disprove it. She may furnish links in a chain of proof, or clews to a new evidence; but she proves nothing. She weighs the probabilities based upon material evidence alone, and cannot, at least upon these subjects, deal in certainties. But the human mind always construes doubtful or ambiguous evidence to the advantage of its own prejudices. The doubter, accordingly, turns from science with his doubts increased, but at the same time scolds her more cautious interpreters for their seeming timidity. Being unable to hold his judgment in suspense, he stands really in opposition to the true spirit of scientific research. He is arbitrary and careless, and takes things for granted upon the negative side, forgetting that negative as well as positive assumptions require proof. And yet he is needed to prevent stagnations. He prepares the way for truth, even when he brings none with him; for he clears away rubbish, undermines many superstitions, and forces people to think whether they will or not. But by his misrepresentations of science he becomes something of a nuisance to scientific men, who prefer to work cautiously, and reduce uncertainty to a minimum.

In direct opposition to these doubters, we find a large class of people who identify faith with credulity, and accept without discrimination whatever certain leaders or authorities may endorse. It is in this class that bigots are commonly found. Not but that there may be bigotry in excessive doubt, as well as in excessive belief; it is only more conspicuous in the latter. For the doubter has in most cases seceded from the credulous class, and, knowing the difficulties which he himself has had to encounter, is able to make allowances for the apparent faults of his antagonists. He, on the other hand, who has always believed unthinkingly, cannot appreciate the difficulties of his neighbor, and never having experienced doubt, knows not how to pardon that which seems to him to be a sin.

But the man who has never doubted has probably never thought.

Now these people commonly stand in a most comical attitude towards material science and rationalistic methods. Whenever either science or reason lends any confirmation to a pet dogma, they are praised to the skies, and their sayings are quoted far and wide as second only to inspiration. But if, on the contrary, they throw doubt upon a doctrine, no matter how unessential that doctrine may be, both science and reason are denounced as illusive, pernicious, and controlled by the Devil. For, strangely enough, these omni-believers fail to see that, if reason and science are essentially delusive, they are as likely to deceive in confirming as in overthrowing a dogma. This peculiarity of their minds becomes clearly manifest upon studying the history of science. A few centuries ago, when certain investigators called the attention of ecclesiastics to the fossil marine shells imbedded in the rocks on the tops of high mountains, their observations were held to confirm the Biblical account of the Deluge, and the Almighty was praised for having preserved such unquestionable records. But when it was found that the petrifications were likely to bring discredit upon the Mosaic cosmogony, the churchmen turned to the right-about, and asserted that the seeming remains were not remains at all, but mere deceptions, invented by Satan to win men from the truth. Equal folly is sometimes displayed even at the present day. Plainly, however, one reason for this peculiarity of the ecclesiastical mind may be found in its tendency to confound that with theology which is quite foreign to its nature; for instance, cosmogony. Although theology may assert that the universe came from the hands of God, it can know little of the natural laws involved in its creation and development. Science, on the other hand, discovers these laws, finds history written in the objects and processes of Nature, and interprets God's methods accordingly.

But the chief cause of the divergence between the man of science and the theologian lies in the radically distinct methods of thought which they follow. Science deals wholly with the reason, submitting all problems to its tests; while theology gives a nebulous and ill-defined something called "faith" the pre-eminence, and makes it the final referee in every question of religious belief. But it seems easy to show that reason must take precedence of faith. For faith never exists except as faith in something; and one cannot put faith in anything until he has decided whether it is worthy of such confidence. You cannot put faith in God until you believe in his existence; and here, before faith can come into play, reason must give its decision. But there seems to be prevalent a total misconception of the nature of faith. Many religionists appear to look upon it as a definite entity by itself; whereas it is merely a peculiar attitude of the mind. It serves as a balance to the understanding, and keeps the latter from being too much troubled by perplexing uncertainties. It will aid no one to discover God, but through it those who have found him become better able to say, "Thy will be done." But it is with faith much as it is with virtue; the loudest boasters have the least.

Now many believe, especially among the more poorly educated of the clergy, guided, as they claim, by faith alone, and take it for granted that a certain church, creed, or book is infallible, and scarcely look, except in the most one-sided manner, for reasons for such belief. But if they cling to a church or book for no other reason than that it claims or has had claimed for it a Divine commission or direct inspiration, they are logically bound to accept every church and every book for which similar claims may be made. If the Bible is held sacred merely upon the strength of faith in authority or tradition, independently of historical or critical evidences, then the Zend Avesta, the Vedas, the Koran, and even the Book of Mormon, must be held sacred also. And as these books in many instances contradict each other, such a blind faith must necessarily lead into quagmires of doubt and uncertainty. But if, in accordance with the dictates of common sense, reason be first called in to decide upon the comparative merits of the various creeds and churches and Bibles, the final decision must be at least in some measure affected by the much decried uncertainties of reason, and the seeker after truth must remain as far as ever from an absolutely unquestionable starting-point. The trouble is that there are sources of uncertainty and of possible error present in every system of religious thought. That ecclesiastical method which ignores this truth merely stiffens its adherents. The scientific method, however, recognizing the uncertainty, strives to reduce it to a minimum; and, in consequence, the man of science has received many insults from the theologian, who is often inclined to throw stones regardless of his own windows.

It is very noticeable that one of the chief clerical objections to scientific conclusions is that they are in many cases uncertain and changeable. Now, having seen that uncertainties also beset the path of the theologian, let us compare them with those which stand in the way of the scientist. But, in passing, it may be well to remember that science is essentially progressive, and that progress implies change. Life is constant change, of which death is the cessation. May not this be as true of churches as of men?

Looking first at natural science, we find that its leading duty is to study relations and to classify the knowledge so obtained. For purposes of classification, in order that large numbers of individual facts may be grouped into masses and conveniently handled, theories are devised; and these theories are continually undergoing revision. Perhaps not one of them is altogether faultless. Many of the clergy, who in general give but superficial attention to scientific matters, misled partly by their own carelessness and partly by the slovenliness which too often attaches to popular teachings, confound these theories with the facts which they symbolize; and, seeing the change in the former, attribute it to uncertainty concerning the latter. But in many, perhaps in most cases, the changes are due not to the invalidation of old discoveries, but to the addition of new ones. Thus, in chemistry, certain symbols are used to represent chemical operations. During the past quarter of a century, one system of these symbols has become practically obsolete, and another has taken its place. The old system was good nevertheless. It represented in convenient form the knowledge of its time. The new, however, includes the old, without denying it, and adds in a better and more intelligible form the later discoveries of the science. Indeed, scientific theories grow, much as trees do; and the full grown law no more invalidates its germinal hypotheses than the adult oak contradicts the seed from which it sprang into being. It is true, however, that incompetent men often seek to force wild speculations into scientific acceptance. But their hypotheses are no more to the discredit of science than the fanaticism of a Torquemada is to the dishonor of religion. A scientist may err, but so may a theologian. Is not error discreditable in both cases? But be this as it may, it is clearly the duty of the theological critic of natural science to distinguish carefully between mere speculations, well-based theories, and the facts of observation themselves. Without such discrimination his criticisms will be worthless.

In dealing with the facts which underlie scientific theories, it is found that most of them are of such a character that they can be re-observed and verified by any person of proper training. Now and then untrained investigators record observations which, having been carelessly made, are good for nothing. Even skillful observers sometimes fall into errors. But if the worthless observations seem to have any important bearings, many keen intellects are sure to examine them critically, and at once expose their faults. So that in the great majority of cases recorded facts of observation may be looked upon as practical certainties. The immediate deductions from them are of a similarly certain character. Thus, for instance, if delicate impressions of ferns are found in the solid rock a thousand feet below the surface of the earth, it is as nearly certain as can be that those impressions were originally formed by actual vegetation, that that vegetation lived before the rocks above its imprints were built up, and that vast periods of time must have elapsed since its death and decay. Here we have a single fact of observation, plus several deductions; the latter being so firmly grounded in the fact that no one but a madman would dream of denying them. If we examine more complex cases, and get at last into the domain of theory, we shall find that every scientific doctrine in general acceptance is similarly composed of facts of observation plus deductions which are more or less intimately connected with the facts themselves; and in most cases the facts must be denied before the theories can be reasonably overthrown.

Science, then, both in its facts and in its theories, can claim in general to reach as near to absolute certainty as man can attain. Its changes are due more to addition than to error. And when its statements are doubted by those outside of its priesthood, the chances are vastly in its favor. But certainty in its highest sense—the absolute, unquestionable truth of things—is doubtless inaccessible to us. The pure oxygen would be fatal. The wine of life needs to be mingled with water.

Now let us look at the uncertainties of theology; leaving out of account the errors into which single individuals may carelessly or ignorantly fall, and dealing only with the difficulties which attend all attempts to decide certain great and important questions. Since ecclesiastical doctrines are built quite largely upon authority, it first becomes necessary to select some standard, and this selection at once lays the foundation for doubt. If the teachings of an individual, of a supposed revelation, or of an organized Church, be made the basis of thought, the uncertainties may possibly be very great.

In the first case, we must examine not only the character of the individual, but also the sources of our knowledge concerning him. We must make sure that he was neither an impostor nor a madman. If he left no autograph writings to testify to his views, then sayings and acts not his may have been attributed to him, and we are bound to look sharply after our witnesses. They may have misrepresented him willfully, but with the most pious intentions. Perhaps they were blinded by enthusiasm; or, it may be, they allowed popular rumor and hearsay to bias their reports. If the individual whom we think to follow as a leader lived in times long anterior to our own, we must not fail, in making up our final estimate, to consider the opinions which a majority of the more judicious among his contemporaries held concerning him. Each of these considerations opens up uncertainties which, though possibly very slight, must ever continue to exist.

In the second case, the supposed revelation upon which we rest our faith may not be wholly worthy of our trust. It may contain contradictions, and statements which can be proved untrue. If it has been handed down to us through antiquity, it may be full of interpolations and of blunders made by stupid copyists. And if it claims no inspiration for itself, and if the very names of those who first set up such claims in its honor are unknown, then the doubts concerning its value as an authority may be very great. Then the character of each inspired writer must be taken into account. Were they inspired in all that they wrote, and how do we know that they were inspired at all? Surely, if the eternal welfare of our souls is to depend upon matters of belief, we ought to gain satisfactory answers to all these questions before we put our faith in a supposed revelation which may save us or destroy us all.

In the third case, we must examine closely the character of the Church which claims authority, before we can rationally trust ourselves to its guidance. In doing this we are forced to scan critically the persons of its founders, and to test in the most thorough manner the authenticity of all its records. These investigations necessarily involve all the uncertainties already pointed out. We must dig up old controversies, and fight old battles over again. And with every step we take, new doubts will arise to confront us.

Suppose, however, that in spite of all uncertainties, a standard of authority be assumed. Then come the doubts attending the interpretation of its canons. And who can quiet these? Thus, for instance, if we take the collection of books known as the Bible for our standard, we shall find partisans proving all sorts of contradictory doctrines from its pages. Unitarianism and Trinitarianism, eternal punishment and universal salvation, all these and more are found by opposing churches within its lids. The Catholic learns from it the Divine commission of his church, while the sensational Protestant finds Rome symbolized as the "scarlet woman." And who shall decide, beyond all possibility of doubt, which side is right and which wrong on any of these questions,—especially when many of the texts upon which great doctrines are built are as unsubstantial and ambiguous as a politician's platform.

In systematized theology, then, the uncertainties are not only numerous, but cumulative. The slightest doubt of authenticity, or a trifling lack of clearness in a record, may vitiate the foundations of an entire system. Such doubts can never be quite unfounded, and absolute clearness rarely exists. If we contrast in a general way these doubts with those which occasionally stray into the field of science, we shall find that the fundamental difference between them is of a very simple nature. Most of the great theological systems are built on cornerstones of history or tradition; or, in other words, rest upon the recorded experiences of persons who lived many years or even centuries ago. These experiences no one now can absolutely verify. The doctrines of science, on the other hand, rise from repeatedly verified and easily re-verifiable observations; the accuracy of which almost any intelligent person of proper training can certify for himself. If, then, a controversy arise between a scientific theory and a theological dogma, although it is possible that the former may be wrong, the chances, as long as uncertainty exists, are vastly in its favor. This is admitted, I think, at least indirectly, by all the theological leaders of the present day, who seek strenuously to interpret the teachings of science in their own manner, in order to secure the weight of their influence.

The argument based upon uncertainty, then, as used by theologians in attacking science, or in warding off its blows, falls to the ground as worthless. The twin argument of changeability goes with it. Theologians are constantly shifting their ground with regard to the essential. That which is necessary to religion in one age becomes wholly unimportant in another. Worthy old Cotton Mather denounced a disbelief in witchcraft as little better than infidelity. And now the credulous divine's theological posterity hurl the name of infidel against the Spiritualists, who are but the believers in witchcraft of the present day. Often it is that the heretic of one age becomes the saint of another.

But perhaps there is no more harmless epithet in common use than this once terrible name of "infidel." The Turk flings it at the Christian, and the latter does not return good for evil. It has been used so indiscriminately as to become practically meaningless. He is an infidel who holds opinions differing from yours. He is one who is unfaithful, and every one is unfaithful in some sense to the creeds which he rejects. But every creed-maker looks upon his own special views as essential, and holds all adverse views pernicious. So we find that creeds differ chiefly in their blunders, while the greatest blunderer denounces his neighbors most loudly. The cry of "infidel" comes most vigorously from the lips least competent to utter it. Would that we might restrict the meaning of that obnoxious term! Let it belong henceforward only to those who are faithless towards themselves,—to the hypocrites of all classes. They, and they alone, are unfaithful to the truth.

But between the extremes of doubt and of belief there lies a middle ground; and here we find many able thinkers who are striving to reconcile ecclesiastical and scientific method, and to bring faith and reason into harmony. Accepting authority to a certain extent, they say with much justice that, while it is bad to believe unreasoningly, it is bad to doubt unreasoningly. If a large majority of the best minds accept a doctrine as true, their decision, their authority, lends some degree of probability to it. They may be in error, but the average individual mind is more likely to err than they. Therefore their conclusions should not be flung aside without careful consideration and sifting of evidence.

Now, although these half-way people vary a great deal, they have much in common. Recognizing both faith and reason as proper agencies in determining religious belief, they seek to find for each its proper sphere of theological labor. But their custom seems to be to place faith and reason side by side as equals, whereas the man of science will insist that faith should always follow in the footsteps of its surer-footed companion. Accordingly, this class of minds is much affected by a tendency to seek a foothold for faith, independently of reason, by making certain unwarrantable, though possibly correct assumptions. Some assume at once the validity of Scripture in its general moral teachings; others take for granted the verity of a Divine incarnation; and yet others hold without due examination to a belief in immortality. But all seem to agree in starting with the reverently unquestioned assumption of the existence of a Deity. But here, despite the truth of the assumption, they are certainly wrong in method. For if God exists, there must be evidence of his existence somewhere; and if it is his will that we should believe in him, that evidence will be, in part at least, accessible to us. But we have no right, before duly weighing such evidence, to assume that he is, any more than that he is not; for the method of thought which would lead us to assert, a priori, the existence of one God, would permit us to believe in many. Theism and polytheism would be equally justifiable. A man's faith would be measured by the number of gods he believed in, and religion would become a matter of quantity rather than of quality. It is man's duty to search for the truth and submit its purest gold to the severest tests. A wise God can never be offended by the reverent doubts and questionings of honest men and women. Just here lies the most radical distinction between the man of science and the average theologian. The latter says, "Believe, and question not!" The former says, "I dare not profess a belief which I have not tested and found worthy."

Here, perhaps, I am very likely to be misunderstood. The thorough believer may say, "I have no need of evidence upon these lofty questions; I hear God's voice in my conscience, and know that he exists; I feel within my soul the truth of immortality." But in speaking thus he is merely citing the evidence upon which his belief is grounded—the evidence of his own intuitions. He cannot doubt consciousness, and therefore his faith, so far as he is himself concerned, is fully justified. He believes certain primal doctrines because his "experiences" lead him to look upon them as reasonable. Without this exercise of reason he could have no belief.

M. Renan, speaking about the Italian Government at a banquet given to him by the Masons of Rome, said: "The government of Italy has a curious way of speaking with apparent respect about Catholicism and religion. But God, the Pope, and the Church are nothing to the Italian ministers but a means of governing. God is a kind of whip in their hands to keep order with something like a gendarme's baton, or police man's staff; but they do not, of course, believe in anything, and only aim to see the whole religious edifice overthrown."—Brooklyn Catholic Review.

The Boston Pilot says: "The Catholic priests are the only clergy in the land who mind their own business, confining themselves to their mission of fighting sin and saving souls; while the non-Catholic clergy meddle in politics, ignore panders to human weakness, and strive to swell with the bubble-puff,."

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

A man is never so alive to kindness from a woman as when he has been recently jilted or ill-used by another; a truth of which Shakespeare could scarcely fail to leave us an illustration (in Romeo and Juliet): and Paul could not be insensible to Esther's concern and sympathy, though he had no idea of emulating the celerity with which the youthful Montague transfers his passion from an old love to a new one; and, in fact, retained too vivid a recollection of Kate's luxuriant beauty to be much impressed with the comparatively quieter charms of her cousin. Like most young men, he had succumbed—as I think I have mentioned before—to externals. His regard for Esther resembled that semi-brotherly feeling which one commonly entertains towards an unusually agreeable feminine cousin; its very trustfulness and freedom from all elements of disgust seemed to forbid the probability of its ever changing its character. He had even kissed her, sometimes, thinking no more of it than did the honest country-girl, whose modesty was too genuine to be squeamish. ("It was only Paul," she said, "and she didn't mind him.") Besides—must I confess it?—at the bottom of his heart there lingered an undivulged hope, of which he was half-ashamed, of a reconciliation with Kate. His first overwhelming paroxysm of rage and jealousy having expended itself, leaving him the weaker for the indulgence, he had secretly come round to his old hankering after his former slavery; and was again willing to sacrifice his self-respect for the sake of her fickle favor.

They occasionally talked, at the farm-house, of Mr. Pennethorne's suit to Esther—if suit it may be called, which consisted of the most awkward, uneasy attentions, insinuated rather than expressed, and sometimes taking such curious forms as to afford matter for laughter; inasmuch that the woolstapler had become a kind of standing joke in the family—of course when his mother's back was turned. Thus he had once attempted to indirectly purchase the girl's good will by the present of an old pinchbeck buckle (such as were worn, a century or so ago, on shoes), evidently regarding it as an article of great rarity and value, and next to irresistible; and being quite overwhelmed with astonishment at her refusal. He was an original, in his way, of a character so peculiar as almost to involve incongruity and self-contradiction. His mother's counterpart in bigotry, narrow-mindedness, and avarice, he lacked her thorough-going selfishness and want of feeling; and never succeeded in persuading himself that he was one of the elect, and, as such, always in the right in his dealings with others, or in braving their opinions. Naturally a shabby fellow, he seemed at odds with destiny, and constantly tormented with a desire to be something better; perhaps in consequence of his extreme approbateness, which sometimes even led him to the verge of a good-natured action, which he would then either recoil from, or perform so ungraciously as to insure the contempt rather than the gratitude of the recipient. He was sociable, but easily offended; shy, but officious; cunning, yet so communicative that he often ran the risk of damaging his own interests by his loquacity; a petty despot over his servants and dependants, but also their gossip and companion. Then, though he made the main chance his guiding principle through life, he was so desperately susceptible to the charms of the sex that he had proposed to more than one portionless beauty and been rejected, before transferring his addresses to Miss Franklin, in whom both his interest and inclination might be supposed to centre. At first, the kind girl could not help being sorry for him, but his meanness and inherent vulgarity of disposition soon banished pity or merged it into contempt. "She would rather," she said, "go out to service than marry him for all his money!"—which was principally derived from a good business, inherited from his father and most diligently prosecuted by the son. It compelled him to travel during part of the year, and thereby relieved her from what might have amounted to a nuisance and persecution.

The winter happened to be a remarkably hard one, accompanied, about Christmas, with an extraordinary fall of snow, which rendered the roads well nigh impassable for a day or two, and almost isolated the village; circumstances not at all unfavorable to the cultivation of the social and in-door virtues, which our friends improved accordingly. One evening, however, when Paul dropped in at the farm-house, rather later than usual, he found Esther alone. Her father had been tempted by the festive traditions of the season into a temporary relapse from the exceptional good behavior induced by his wife's absence, and was celebrating the impending anniversary at the tavern; while Harry, a little indisposed and fatigued by having superintended the distribution of the carcass of an ox to the poor of the village (a local charity), had gone to bed. Esther, herself, seemed thoughtful, not to say low-spirited, as she sat musing by the fire, the ruddy reflection of which was mirrored in her dark hair and soft, brown eyes.

"A penny for your thoughts," said Paul, after remarking on her position and returning her greeting, which included the news just imparted to the reader.

"I'll tell you for nothing," she answered. "I was thinking about you and Harry; and how dull it will be next Christmas, when you are both so far away. Ruth and I were talking of it, this afternoon, in church—how odd it was, to be sure!" Least two rather devout young women should be here suspected of irreverence, it may be advisable to explain that, in conjunction with the clerk, they had been employed in decorating the sacred edifice for the approaching festival—a proceeding which merely involved the swathing of the capitals of the squat Norman columns of the nave with holly and ivy, crowning the effigies of Sir Toby Edgecombe and his two wives with wreaths of the same, and sticking bits of box about the pews; for Mr. Blencowe would tolerate no more, on the score of anti-ritualistic objections, and the absence of "the family," on the continent, left him master of the situation.

"Why, Esther, you'll have to cross the Atlantic yourself, some day," Paul answered—"at least if you keep your word with Harry."

"Ah! but he'll come and fetch me, and I shall be with him, and that's so different from going to a foreign country, where you are quite unacquainted. But, after all, I wish none of us had to leave dear old England." And Esther heaved a deep sigh.

"Do you think your father will let you go, when it comes to the point?"

"I hardly know. Don't talk about it, please. It'll depend upon circumstances. Aren't you sorry to leave England?"

"Why," said Paul, "I might be more so. You know how I'm situated at home and that I can't be expected to shed many tears at parting. I have been happier here than anywhere else that I remember. When I think most tenderly of England, Esther, be sure that it'll mean 'Thorpe Parva.'"

She gave him her hand in sympathy, but made no reply. When two friends—especially of different sex—are alone together, they generally become confidential and communicative; and Paul, impelled by that rather morbid egotism in which we are all, perhaps, at times prone to indulge, went on: "I never had that which no success or good fortune in after life can, I think, make amends for the deprivation of—a happy home. My grandparents never seemed to care to teach me to love them, and, for the matter of that, I don't pretend to. All the obligations in the world won't insure affection, if there's not kindness. Like your stepmother, Esther, Mr. and Mrs. Gower's notions, both of this life and the next, are based on opinions which I do not share; and which, I believe, never made a single human being the better or happier, but, on the contrary, have poisoned existence to thousands. They—my kinsfolk—have not Mrs. Franklin's temper, to be sure, or her detestable, ultra, ingrained selfishness, but the principle is the same and the result not very different. It's an old story in our family, the more's the pity!"

Esther still kept silence, interpreting which according to his own inclination the young man continued: "Before I was born, it made my father's home hateful to him, set him at variance with his parents and, finally, adrift for life; when, with the exercise of a little charity and forgiveness—I had almost said natural affection (such as one sees, every day, in people pretending to no such sanctity)—his whole career might have been different, and a vast amount of wretchedness spared to everybody. And it has wrought more or less misery and mischief in the family for three generations. Self-seeking on one hand—the object transferred to another existence, but still self-seeking—and repression on the other, that's what my grandfather's creed amounts to; and it has been carried out with cruel fidelity in his life. A rich man, he allowed his children none of the advantages they ought naturally to have inherited; never, as it seemed, understanding that they possessed any claim upon him in that respect until after his death; and always, as it were, keeping them at a distance. Not one of his sons but has virtually repudiated the paternal faith, and retains bitter, humiliating recollections of his youth; while one daughter went mad, and at least two of the others married men whom they didn't love, merely because they were tired of home and wanted husbands. Not a very successful family history, I think! So far as I am able to judge, even worldliness—a positive indifference to all higher aims than mere getting on in the world and living for the present—works less evil than narrow-minded, partial, and arbitrary ideas of religion, however orthodox or generally accepted. If I were to tell you what I had suffered from them, it would frighten you."

Perhaps because she didn't want to be frightened, possibly from a disinclination to the subject (which was not an uncommon one with Paul, when very much in earnest and among his friends), Esther expressed no desire for such a revelation; but, instead, asked him, in rather a low voice, if he heard the Christmas bells, remarking how sweetly they sounded.

"They do," he answered, and proceeded to quote Tennyson and Charles Lamb, in reference to the sound and, almost, season; which passages need not here be repeated, because the reader is sure to know the first and ought to be acquainted with the second. "I wish there were nothing preached there out of harmony with them; or that I could listen like a child to the message of 'Peace on earth and good-will towards men,' untroubled by less heavenly considerations. But they'll read the Athanasian creed, even on Christmas Day, and a pretty commentary that'll be!" You were talking, Esther, about next Christmas. I dare say I shall remember this one when the time comes round, and perhaps feel sad and solitary enough, for all the novelty and independence I promise myself in the new world. I can fancy myself strolling along-side the great, lonely, cotton-fields, under the bright stars and humid night of a Louisiana winter, down to the levees of the turbid Mississippi (Paul had evidently been reading up, in preparation for the United States), thinking of to-night and England—conjuring up the picture of the dear old farm-house, the deep snow, the sound of the Christmas bells, and you and I sitting by the fireside. God bless this house, Esther!—and I had almost added, all belonging to it. If I were to come back and find you and Harry away, I should feel like a ghost, haunting the place where it had been most happy in a former state of existence—Esther, dear! don't!—I didn't intend—what is the matter?"

But Esther's feelings had been over wrought, and she was crying bitterly. There is no knowing how far Paul might have gone in his efforts to console her—for he had involuntarily put his arm around her waist and was immensely touched and surprised at her emotion—but, just then, the sound of the opening and closing of the little gate across the courtyard gave warning of the return of Mr. Franklin, which perhaps operated more rapidly than Paul's words (or actions) would have done in restoring Esther's composure. At least she exhibited all a woman's quick-wittedness in disguising her agitation, and was much less disturbed than her companion when the farmer entered—in rather boisterous spirits and by no means disposed to take exception at anything. Of course this arrival broke up the conference; and soon after Paul having pledged Mr. Franklin in a glass of gin and water—which he insisted on having, in honor of the season, though it was, in his case, a decidedly superfluous indulgence—the young man bade his friends good-night and departed. But as he crossed the wintry close and churchyard, leading to the vicarage, he could not help thinking a good deal of Esther's behavior; and somehow it afforded him remarkable gratification.

She told him on the morrow that she had "given away" in consequence of his melancholy talk and her own previous low spirits; as was, indeed, the case; but the subject was not again referred to between them. And within a few days afterwards Paul Gower returned to London.

Mr Abbot would like to make a few engagements to lecture, in places not far distant from Toledo, between now and the first of June.

All true friends of science will rejoice over the fact that Mr. John Anderson, of New York, has given the entire Island of Penikese (at the entrance to Buzzard's Bay), containing about one hundred acres, and fifty thousand dollars, towards establishing under Prof. Agassiz a normal school for students in science. This is so much indirectly in aid of free religion.

The enlightened State of New Jersey prosecuted John Gage, of Vineland, for chopping wood on Sunday. Mr. Gage pleaded "guilty," but offered in defence the state of his physical health which required exercise even on the "Lord's day." He was tried by jury; and they, notwithstanding Mr. Gage's plea, found him not "guilty." New Jersey will have to try again.

A fervently-pious correspondent of The World's Crisis and Second Advent Messenger (published in Boston) closes a letter to that journal by saying: "We believe Jesus is soon coming." Perhaps so; but we cannot help thinking that when he really arrives he will select a very different sort of company from that which his church-friends seem now to expect.

James Freeman Clarke, in a sermon on "Why the Unitarian Movement should be supported," says (speaking against creeds): "When we have faith in Jesus himself, we do not need a creed to tell us what to think about him." Very true; but why is it necessary to have "faith in Jesus himself"? If you insist ever so gently that it is, then you make such faith a creed. And this is just where Unitarianism halts on its way to freedom. It does insist on "faith in Jesus himself;" and that is what makes it a sect among sects, and keeps it from being a real, vital, progressive "movement."

For the numerous expressions of sympathy and confidence brought to me by every mail, I desire to return my grateful thanks. It is impossible to reply to more than a small portion of them, but I trust that the writers will accept this assurance of my keen appreciation of the generous support now so freely tendered. That the public opinion of the stockholders and subscribers would be overwhelmingly in favor of an honest prosecution of the work to which THE INDEX has from the beginning been devoted, and against the attempt by one or two men to pervert the funds of the Index Association to their own private advantage, was not a doubtful matter; and the responses now pouring in to Col. Higginson, to Mr. Stevens, and to myself are but the visible evidence of the fact. In this connection I wish to say that, with regard to the libels upon my character elsewhere advertised in these columns, I have nothing to ask but that the reader's judgment shall be simply suspended till my reply (shortly to appear) has been also read. No friend of mine need fear that I shall stoop to the level of my accuser. If my character cannot stand such attacks as this, the exposure has come none too soon.

FORMATION AND REFORMATION.

Two distinctly different methods characterize the old and the new school of religion. The postulate of Orthodoxy has been that every child is born with a depraved and sinful nature, with which little or nothing can be done in the direction of hopeful improvement until a certain age is arrived at, when, by the act of God, that nature can be changed or supplemented in the process of so-called "conversion." In the beginning, comparative little stress was put by Orthodoxy upon religious education of the young. Inasmuch as their nature was evil, there was nothing in them to be educated; everything rather to be repressed. They were to be treated as sinners doomed to wrath, until God in his own time should change their hearts by giving them the "new birth." Each soul, then, was to be brought to perfection, not by training and development, but by providential conversion and regeneration.

Entirely different is the method of radicalism. We look upon every soul as a candidate by nature for perfection, as containing within itself the germs of the most ineffable improvement. Just as it is, we consider it glorious; with its capacity of becoming, we consider it more glorious still. We receive the new-born child as the subject of immediate education. The natural process of evolution already has brought it to our hands; and, as months and years climb into its being, we seek to aid this process of development by every method of training which from time to time becomes applicable. We take the nature of the child as a unit, not overlooking any of its faculties, not omitting to make educational provision for them all. We do not expect that it will ever need mental or moral regeneration any more than physical. As we now regard it, it is thoroughly born once in all respects; we do not look for it to be re-born in any particular. Being born, we expect only that it will grow; and our earnest and reverent desire is to help that growth to be clean, vigorous, thorough, harmonious, and successful.

Radicalism, then, lays all stress upon education; none at all upon conversion. It would begin at the beginning; not in the middle, or at the end. In working up human civilization it does not sollicit good-sized sinners for its raw material, thinking by some ecclesiastical prestomarche operation to convert them into saints. It prefers rather the docile age and the docile condition, when minds are forming and capable of being formed; and it seeks to produce as its crowning result character, not "salvation." Its idea is that formation is better than reformation: what is once rightly formed does not need to be reformed. Transformed everything may become by growth, passing by the process of development from the lower into the higher. The human soul's perfection does not proceed by those spiritual jerks known as "conversions," but by the steady law of progress, and under the influence of wise education and culture. Not that there is never any crisis in growth, as indeed there is; but this crisis is never a change of nature—only a budding of new functions, a blossoming of new features, a fruition of new results.

The thoroughly radical mind loves the ways of Nature, and seeks more and more to adopt them; seeks to be guided by her wise instruction, and shuns the shallow counsels of irrational men. It looks with grave disapprobation upon the popular methods of the Church, especially those so-called "revivals of religion" by which it makes the face of religion to be like that of the consumptive,—now pale and bloodless with feebleness and languor, and then crimson with the hectic glow of unhealthful excitement. No steady fervor of daily trust, of hourly earnest devotion to duty, of inward content and calm, and reverent recognition of the sublime orderliness of the universe, is possible under these circumstances. And the wise radical even sometimes wishes that there were fewer so-called reforms and reformers in the world; that so many good men and women would not insist on being so benevolent, nor try so hard to make all the intemperate temperate, all the vicious virtuous. He sees that whatever grows must have long spells of being let alone, or at least of being sparingly and very judiciously aided. He knows that very often inward development is transpiring when none outward is apparent. His faith is in formation more than in reformation.

SELF-CONTAINED.

There is no finer or grander illustration of a commanding self-respect, a consciousness of integrity absolutely unassailable from without, than is found in the so-called "Apology" of Socrates; although his was the very antipodes of the "apologetic" spirit. As rendered in the noble version of Professor Jowett, there is something in such sentiments as these which must thrill every one capable of comprehending them: "I would have you know that, if you kill such a one as I am, you will injure yourselves more than you will injure me. Meletus and Anytus will not injure me: they cannot; for it is not in the nature of things that a bad man should injure a better than himself. I do not deny that he may, perhaps, kill him, or drive him into exile, or deprive him of civil rights; and he may imagine, and others may imagine, that he is doing him a great injury. But in that I do not agree with him; for the evil of doing as Anytus is doing—of unjustly taking away another man's life—is greater far."

What a magnificent serenity of spirit is here disclosed! What a boundless independence of the fears that make captives of vulgar minds! What a sublime confidence in the essential rectitude of Nature, and in the impenetrability of the shield she holds before every one of her children that calmly trusts in her! What a superb contempt of the power of mischief which the little Meletus and Anytus fancied they possessed, but which was shivered into as many fragments as a bit of pottery hurled against a granite obelisk! What a grave commiseration for the folly with which these small antagonists strove to injure another, and injured themselves alone!

There are many incomparable things of their kind in the Scriptures of the Hebrews and the Christians; but there is nothing among them all which so fascinates and invigorates my own mind as this picture of the invulnerable Socrates. The ideal of moral greatness it exhibits has such colossal mass, such invincible dignity, such indomitable pride of character, that all the smooth and yielding virtues of the Christian saint seem like thistle-down in comparison. Jesus was submissive; Socrates was victorious. Jesus was wounded; Socrates was invulnerable.

It is this vastness of moral strength in the presence of evil that gives me my grandest conception of human character. The graces, the sentiments, the mild attractions, are all lovely, and by no means inconsistent with intensity of moral force; but where this is wanting, nothing can fill the void. An absolute unyieldingness may suddenly appear the supreme virtue; and then to yield is the soul's general collapse. Self-assertion may at times be simply Nature's asseveration of her own eternal and immutable law; and because Socrates asserted himself without asserting any divine or human lordship, he stands in one vital respect superior to all the founders of religions. He was self-contained,—found the great fountain of power in his own nature, because he kept his own nature fresh and pure by obedience to the universal order. He needed no lordship, and had no lord. Hence came that tone of invincibility, that marvellous development of self-respect, that absolute and evident superiority to all the vindictiveness and malice of his enemies, which has made him, though seemingly their victim, in fact their victor. I find in the spirit thus exemplified a high type of what Free Religion is to accomplish for mankind; and I marvel that Socrates should seem to any one destitute of religiousness. Recognize the differences of type in this quality of all magnificent natures; and perhaps you will conclude that Socrates was one of the most religious of men because he was one of the most wonderfully self-contained.

FALSE AND TRUE OPTIMISM.

Optimism—the belief that the world is the best possible, and that every act and incident in it at any particular time is the best possible in view of all circumstances, and in reference to the ultimate good of the whole—may be a true theory, and it may be a comforting theory to the theologian in his studies, to the philosopher in his speculations, to any person in moments of serenity, when individually free from the pressure of evil conditions. But I suspect that this belief does not generally come to comfort those who stand most in need of comfort. When the iron enters one's own soul, it is not so easy to be an optimist. There are ills in our human lot too profound, too heavy, too bitter, for any who are under the burden of them to have the heart to say: "This is all as it should be; this is what I need; this is the best thing which could possibly have been arranged for me." Could such a sentiment find utterance, it would be indeed a solemn mockery, and would betray a want of the very feeling from which must come the motive-power which is to resist the ills of life and triumph over them. If optimism is to be interpreted as meaning unconditionally, in the moral as in the material universe, that "whatever is, is right," as Pope put it in his oft-quoted aphorism; if it mean that everything in the world this moment is the best thing possible in the eye of Infinite Goodness, and just as we might conceive Infinite Goodness would approve and wish it to be,—then optimism seems to me most false both in theory and experience.

And thus understood, it not only seems to me groundless in reason, but dangerous to morals. I cannot bring myself to say that even all things are the best possible, considered with reference to the after and ultimate good of all persons; that Infinite Goodness, though looking to the future, were it to keep full control of human conditions and actions, would arrange everything, will everything, just as we find it today. Such a doctrine of optimism appears to me to blaspheme the Infinite Goodness nearly as much as did the old dogma of predestinating a portion of the human race to eternal misery. To suppose that a Being of infinite purity could look with complacency upon the assassin's crime, the swindler's plot of lying and robbery, the prodigal's infamous lust and treachery, the cruelties under which millions of human beings have been crushed by selfish power, because in the future his omniscient eye sees that good will come out of these evils,—much more to suppose that he has by his own free purpose and will arranged all these acts as the best way of producing this after good,—this is to violate the very idea of goodness, and to confound all valid distinction: between right and wrong. The only sense in which I can conceive optimism to be acceptable to a rationally and morally earnest mind is, that the world as a whole is the best possible, considering that human beings are responsible actors in it, and help to make it what at any moment it is; that is, that the conditions of human existence with regard to physical and moral evil have progressed as far as could rationally be expected on the plan of making man a prime agent in improving his own condition.

But Heaven forbid that we should suppose that with reference to man's future good all present things are alike available as material,—that one act is as good as another; that a bad man is as good for the purpose as a good man; that wickedness is as serviceable as virtue; that all moral distinctions vanish in the presence of some supreme transforming spirit that takes all our human conditions,—the ill and the good, the bitter and the sweet, the vicious and the virtuous,—and, putting them all together into its crucible, straightway brings forth a product always of the same texture and serviceableness! Heaven forbid that in any absolute, unconditional sense we should say, "whatever is, is right," and that we should lose our horror of evil and crime because possibly we may see some way in which they may, by and by, ages hence perhaps, be converted into good! All things do indeed work together for good. But they do so because men keep clear in their minds the distinction between things as they are and things as they ought to be, and strive to make "the ought to be" actual. They do so because men see the difference between good and evil, and know from daily observation and experience that there are many things in the world that are not right, and that will not be likely to come right, or be transmuted into any form of goodness, unless they take hold and help do it. "All things work together for good,"—but not without man as a worker.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

It is a curious fact that a great rival to Harvard seems likely to arise from one of the last quarters whence we should have expected it; namely, the Methodist sect. This Wesleyan University, which has very large endowments by legacies, is laying out its plans on a very broad scale, with the expectation of becoming the greatest institution of learning in the country. It has already organized its theological department, where I suppose the sectarian lines are strictly observed. But the law department has for its dean Mr. George S. Hillard, a Unitarian in religion, well known for his fine scholarship, but ranked among the most conservative of Boston literati.

At present the proposed establishment of the medical department is exciting great interest, since the University recognizes Homoeopathy as of equal standing with the old school, and gives the Homoeopathic Society the offer of managing this department, on the simple condition of paying all its expenses. The prestige and diploma of the University, however, are a sufficient inducement to the Homoeopathic Society to establish this alliance. At the same time, the New England Female Medical College, which was run entirely by its secretary, Dr. Gregory, having lost him by death, is likely to fall into the hands of this same University. The Methodists, accepting the doctrine that "in Christ are neither male nor female," open their departments freely to all comers, and women will have a fair chance to stand side by side with men. The Homoeopathic Association have asked for the transfer of this college to their care, to be incorporated with their medical department; and, as they have also freely admitted women to their Association, it seems as if a full and free opportunity was secure to women who have faith in this method of practice. A number of women have already applied for admission. We hope that the medical department will at once establish a high standard, and give its diploma only upon careful and thorough examination.

An effort has also been made to unite the Female Medical College with Harvard University. It would certainly be a very great step in advance for the old college to take the education of women in any branch under its fostering care; and we are glad that the Board have been able to give their attention to a matter of such trifling importance as the education of half the race. But they demand so very large an endowment with the Female Medical College that it is hardly possible that it can be raised in season to prevent the transfer to the Boston University.

So much for the medical aspects of this institution and its relation to the education of woman. But another question interests us. What effect will the establishment of this great University on a professedly sectarian basis have upon the cause of free religion? With so much of progress in all other departments, will it be a stumbling-block in the way of theological reform? The rise and progress of Methodism is a very interesting phase of Church history, and it has unquestionably done great service in contesting some of the harshest doctrines of Calvinism; but it also fosters many of the most extravagant superstitions, and as much or more than any other sect encourages that excited, emotional piety which we hold to be very injurious to true mental health and genuine religious life. But in thus allying itself to science in its freest and most progressive forms, will not the spirit of Methodism itself be changed? Will not the believing wife convert the unbelieving husband, and the Boston University be led into broader paths than are now dreamed of by its founders?

We shall watch its development with interest, hoping that so great a power will be used for the progress of science and the advancement of broad and liberal culture.

LONDON LETTER.

REFORM IN BURIAL RITES—CHEMICAL CREMATION INSTEAD OF INTERMENT—SENTIMENTAL AND SANITARY CONSIDERATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Without waiting to know the effect upon your readers of my last letter about Euthanasia, I proceed to give them another violent shock.

From my past experience of human kind, I feel convinced that it is much more difficult to effect a change in their social customs than in their ethics. In every country the births, marriages, and deaths are attended by certain social rites which are more imperious than any demands of conscience, and it would be easier far to relax or to tighten the restraints of morality than to alter one of the social ceremonies. I half expect then that, for every one whom I may have startled by my last letter, there will be a score to be horrified by what I am going to say in this.

I wish to revolutionize our funeral rites. I want to abolish the burial of the dead, and the wearing of "mourning."

If the reader should lose his breath here, let me pause for a moment and tell him that my object originates in pure pity. I desire to relieve mankind of a great and needless burden; to remove some of the greatest aggravations to which we have foolishly submitted, in times of our deepest grief; and to institute customs which will be an unspeakable relief to the poor. My objections to the present system of interment, with its distressing paraphernalia of Undertakerism, are as follows:—

The first and least important objection is that it is needlessly expensive and an undoubted hardship on the poor. Second, that it is sooner or later a source of great injury to the public health. Third, that our cemeteries occupy a vast amount of space which could be more profitably filled. Fourth,—and this I reckon to be the chief of all objections,—it is a needless and cruel aggravation of our physical and mental pain in bereavement, to witness the process of interment.

There may be some persons whose feelings are not harrowed by this sight; but I can speak for myself and for thousands of persons of equally sensitive nerves and strong imagination, that it is positive torture to witness the burial of the body of a very near and dear relative. The outward form which we have loved and caressed we place in a coffin, close fitting to the outline of a human body (a coffin is in itself a melancholy object, quite apart from its associations); and this gloomy case, containing our beloved dead, we follow to the dark vault or deep grave, into which it is lowered amid choking sobs and a dead weight at our hearts. We leave the loved object at the bottom of a cold, dark pit, in which we picture to ourselves, for months and years afterwards, all the foul and revolting processes of chemical decay, our thoughts being positively scourged by this haunting picture. It is bad enough to lose our friends and to miss them day by day; but it is a monstrous aggravation of our physical pain in losing them, to be tortured by such visions, such memories.

Now what I would propose is this. As soon as death is perfectly assured,—after such an interval as would render it impossible for a medical man to doubt that death had ensued,—the body should be chemically destroyed. It should be placed in some receptacle containing those powerful agents known to chemical science, which would simply annihilate the outward form and practically destroy it. There would necessarily be some deposit, which one might call the "ashes" of the dead; and these might be reverently gathered and placed in a beautiful urn or vase, to be disposed of according to the wishes of the survivors. They might easily be deposited in consecrated places, in niches in the walls of churches, or in mortuary chapels designed for their reception. This, too, might be accompanied by a religious service; so that the religious element is left untouched by my revolutionary proposal.

The advantage of all this to people of highly-wrought feelings would be immense. I can imagine the peaceful calm which would steal over the mind when one could take reverently into one's hands the sacred urn and say, "This holds all that remains of my beloved." No horror of dark vaults and damp graves, with their seething corruption. No precious body being eaten piecemeal by worms of the earth, or melting away in a loathsome stream. The form is changed; the substance really remaining after chemical burning is not in the least degree suggestive of the past or the future. The body is saved thereby from every possible dishonor, purified from every decay. No words can describe the relief which such a process would bring to many and many an afflicted soul. On the ground of health to the community, it would also be most salutary. We little know, in England at least, what mischief is brewing for us in our seething cemeteries. They are getting fuller and fuller, at the rate of I know not how many hundreds of corpses a day, the later ones being nearer and nearer the surface. Many are within four feet of the turf, and that is not enough to prevent the escape of the most foul and pestilential gases. I know of one old cemetery which is now occupied by a cooperage, and which is constantly wet with stagnant water. All around it typhus fever is perpetually raging. The danger would not be so great if the bodies were buried without a coffin. The earth would sooner disinfest them; but as it is, the mischief is nursed and multiplied a hundred-fold by the process of decay being delayed.

It is quite possible that an outcry might be made on the plea of my scheme being impracticable. I can only say that our undertakers might take this subject into their consideration, and see whether they could not furnish all that was necessary, and conduct the business of destroying the body with decency and skill. Science will not fail to furnish the best chemical agents for performing this service speedily and inoffensively.

I should not have touched on the question of economy but for my sad experience amongst the poor. The most ordinary burial costs them five pounds; that is a fearful sum for a really poor family to contribute, and that often after heavy medical expenses. Whereas my plan ought to be quite within the cost of a fifth of that sum, let it be done in the best manner possible.

As for the rites of burial in themselves, no wise man would care what became of his own dead body, so long as it was not left to be an injury to the living. I should not mind being sent to the dissecting room, or to the kennels. But the rites of burial assume a very important aspect in the interests of the surviving relatives and friends. And for their sakes I plead that that those rites may be made as little harrowing as possible; may conduce as much as possible to console and cheer them, and leave no artificially cruel memories and associations behind them. It is on this ground that I object to the barbarous practice of "Christian" burial and would do my utmost to revolutionize our customs in this matter, and introduce a refined method of burning instead. Christianity is deeply to blame for aggravating our fear of death, and for aggravating our grief when death visits our homes. It is time that we turned such a religion out of doors; not only expelling it from our hearts and minds, but driving out its offensive and oppressive customs,—thus claiming the privileges of consolation under bereavement, which are ours by nature.

In another letter I must write a word or two on the subject of wearing "mourning."

I am very sincerely yours,
CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DELRICH, S. E., March 14, 1873.

P. S. I have mentioned the subject to some of my most admired and cultivated friends, and I never met yet with a discouraging remark from them. All we want is for some brave family to set the example.

The Christian Register says: "The Independent has heard a young man, liberally inclined, and fresh from one of the columns of our Toledo contemporary, exclaim: 'If I wanted to become a High Calvinist or an Ultramontanist, I should diligently read this INDEX.' Very likely; and the explanation is that THE INDEX believes in and teaches the logic of 'Reason or Rome.' If those who follow its instructions cannot accept the former, they will then go to the latter."

Commodore Vanderbilt has given half a million of dollars to a Methodist University in the South. Has the commodore begun at last to think of old age and death, and of the fate which it is said awaits such worldlings as he in the hereafter? And does he now seek to buy of the Church its ready-made insurance policy against "the wrath to come"? Why not? If this ecclesiastical insurance company can take such risks as murderers offer, they can safely venture in the case of the commodore. It is only the risk of insuring a "mere moral man" that they stagger at!

A LETTER FROM MR. BUTTS.

TOLEDO, April 2, 1873.

TO THE ACTING EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Will you give place in your "Voices of THE INDEX Constituency" for me to reply to the criticisms which appear in THE INDEX for April 5, especially to those more personal to myself? I think Mr. Ives wishes to be a gentleman, and I do him the honor to believe that when he knows how grossly he was misled by the "Valedictory" of the late editor, he will make hearty apology for the tone of his letter. If he wishes to do me justice in this matter, he will read carefully the statement of the Directors, and my own arraignment of Mr. Abbot for insincerity and incompetency, which I have mailed to his address. If he will then say that he candidly believes that the Directors have made "money making" a primary consideration, have sought "pecuniary return," or that they have sought to put "the expression" of Mr. Abbot's "heart or head" under any supervision or direction at all, or that in any fair sense of the word "have forced the retirement of Mr. Abbot," then I will take the trouble at our earliest convenience to convince him of his error and the injustice he does us. Until he has fully and carefully examined the subject, I beg him to remember that the man who has thirty-two shares in THE INDEX stock has some rights as well as he who has but two. I hope it will occur to him that four men who have been in their present position from the start, who have known Mr. Abbot personally for years, may possibly know as well their man and the interests of the cause and their own responsibilities in the premises, as a man who knows Mr. Abbot mainly through the paper or the brightest side of his personal character. I think if he and others will save their heat, and read and ponder well the right and wrong of this unhappy business, they will see who has really attempted to violate "the implied conditions on which the stock subscriptions were obtained," and who, if any one, has made a "business speculation" of THE INDEX. I ask Dr. Oliver to read calmly and studiously my impeachment of Mr. Abbot in a circular I have sent him, with the information from the Directors that they have made their best efforts to call an immediate special meeting of the Association. In my circular, I have exposed Mr. Abbot's subterfuge as to a full Board. I now propose to Mr. Ives, and to others who sympathize with him, that as neither party would like to compel the other to support a man who is distrusted by that other party, that he or they name the per cent. on every dollar of investment which he will give or take. I will either buy out Mr. Ives' investment or sell to him my own at the per cent. named by him, the buyer to become responsible for all indebtedness, past or prospective. Permit me to say to those who write ill-considered private letters of admonition to me on this affair, that I undertake to reply only to those who have given THE INDEX as many cents as I have dollars. I must draw a line somewhere (I have received only three of these yet). I do however quite sympathize with these people. I myself had Abbotism on the brain, and heart too, a year ago, as bad as any of them.

I look through my reams of letters from Mr. Abbot, and find such profuse professions of honor and integrity on every page I wonder I could have taken all his glitter for pure gold.

My offer as above mentioned will stand open until further notice.

Very respectfully,
ASA K. BUTTS.

P. S. Mr. Morse's suggestions show many grains of sense. Here is a noble disregard of the property of others. Two men at least, without either of whom the paper would have stopped more than twenty months ago and died a final death, who breathed into its expiring body the breath of their own life, would like to know whether this proposition is serious or not. To be sure, if Mr. Abbot keeps on in his effort to ruin the property, they may soon be glad to pay something to be relieved from the burden of debt coming on them. But I hope the radicals are not disposed to be highway robbers just yet. If Mr. Morse means that THE INDEX should be bought of its present owners, by those who do think Mr. Abbot worthy, and presented to him, I can see some free religion in that proposal, and for my part will sell out for less than fifty cents on the dollar. What does Mr. Morse's experience and observation teach him as to the success of journals which are conducted alone by one man? Or by ex-ministers in couples? How could Greeley have got on with the Tribune, without McClrath and Sinclair? Does the history of the Radical teach us anything? Did Mr. Morse ever see a man run very fast without legs?

A. K. B.

[Our first feeling, on reading the above article in MS., was that its sneering personalities made it unworthy of publication; but, on conclusion, we thought it better to allow it to appear just as it is, well assured that its proper effect will fall exactly where it belongs. It was also Mr. Abbot's particular desire that we should print it. The writer alludes to "past indebtedness" of the Index Association. We would simply say that the Index Association has no "past indebtedness," and that it is free from debt to-day.—Ed.]

VOICES FROM THE INDEX CONSTITUENCY.

MARATHON, N. Y., March 23, 1873.

EDITOR INDEX:—

With equal pain and surprise I read in the last issue of THE INDEX Mr. Abbot's "Valedictory," and also the statement of your own prospective withdrawal from its editorial management.

It is hardly possible, I suppose, for the local Board to realize how completely THE INDEX and Mr. Abbot have become identified in the minds of its readers. As one somewhat acquainted with the feelings of a portion of its patrons, I would if possible convey to those gentlemen some idea of the terrible mistake they are making in supposing that a pecuniary or any other success can be achieved in any other direction. THE INDEX is his child; born of the elemental forces of his brain, and can no more be put out to dry-nurse to these gentlemen and live, than it could have been generated originally by them. They have forgotten the fable of the goose that laid the golden egg. It seems needless to repeat the experiment again.

I am sure no man worthy of the position can be found who will consent to take the place on any other terms than those indicated by Mr. Abbot. Having had some experience in the editorial line, I feel sure that no paper engaged in leading such a movement as THE INDEX has awakened can do it successfully on any other plan than that substantially marked out by him. It must not become a mere machine for money-getting. Such a course would not be tolerated a moment. But Mr. Abbot shows himself possessed of thorough business capacities in that he is willing to trust the future somewhat to re-imburse present outlays. Horace Greeley made the Tribune the greatest intellectual lever of the age by just such a course, paying large salaries to secure the best talent when mediocrity could have been had for the asking. The result vindicated the wisdom of his course. Let these gentlemen remember that radicals, unlike politicians or Christians, will not tacitly uphold such injustice for the "good of the cause," well knowing that such a course would end in its ruin. I have read carefully their "Business Notice," and out of their own mouths, it seems to me, they are condemned.

Hoping that the difficulty will prove only temporary, and end in the return of Mr. Abbot to his post, I remain,

Yours respectfully,
M. L. HAWLEY.

KENDALLVILLE, Ind., March 22, 1873.

INDEX ASSOCIATION:

Gentlemen,—Your paper of the 22d inst., announcing the retirement of Mr. Abbot from the editorial control of THE INDEX is received. And now gentlemen, in all frankness permit me to say, that no man in America but Mr. Abbot can edit or control that paper with the consent of its subscribers. He and he only is the soul, life, genius, and power which has made the paper what it is, and without which it will sink into comparative nothingness.

I am not a stockholder in the Association, and have no right to interfere with its business management further than this, that the Association has contracted with every subscriber of the paper that Mr. Abbot should edit it untrammelled by you or the Association. Hence I can but brand your untimely interference as a gross breach of your contract with subscribers. You may rest assured, gentlemen, that your Association would never have been known far outside of the city of Toledo, but for the personal regard with which Mr. Abbot is held by the patrons of the paper; and under the circumstances no effort of yours will be able to bridge the "chasm" which you have opened between yourselves and the subscribers. With Mr. Abbot as editor, I want the paper; without (under the circumstances) not. I know nothing about you nor do I care anything about you, or any one else, when you or they voluntarily place yourselves between Mr. Abbot and the readers of THE INDEX. That I am most thoroughly out of patience with you is but too true; nor do I seek to hide it. Subscribers have some rights which publishing Association are bound to respect.

In the independence and freedom which THE INDEX was born to defend, I am

Yours for the right,

L. E. GOODWIN.

I fully concur in the above.

J. M. P. BACHELDER.

I do the same.

THE KING IS DEAD.—Mr. Klaes, otherwise known as the "king of smokers," died not long ago in Holland. The Belgian papers say that he had amassed a large fortune in the linen trade, and one portion of a mansion he had erected near Rotterdam was devoted to the arrangement of a collection of pipes, according to their nationality and chronological order. By his will, which he executed shortly before his death, he directed that all the smokers of the country should be invited to his funeral, and that each should be presented with 10 lbs. of tobacco and two Dutch pipes of the newest fashion, on which should be engraved the name, arms, and date of the decease of the testator. His relatives, friends, and funeral guests were strictly enjoined to keep their pipes lighted during the funeral ceremony and afterwards to empty the ashes from their pipes on the coffin. The poor of the neighborhood, who attended to his last wishes, were to receive annually, on the anniversary of his death, 10 lbs. of tobacco and a small cask of good beer. He further directed that his oak coffin should be lined with the cedar of his old Havana cigar boxes, and that a box of French caporal and a packet of old Dutch tobacco should be placed at the foot of his coffin. His favorite pipe was to be placed by his side, with a box of matches, a flint and steel, and some tinder—for, as he truly said, there was no knowing what might happen. It has been calculated that the deceased gentleman, during his eighty years of life, smoked more than four tons of tobacco, and drank about 500,000 quarts of beer. It is sad to reflect that one evidently possessed of such noble qualities should have been thus prematurely cut off at the early age of eighty, doubtless owing to his indulgence in a pernicious habit! His fate should be a warning to all smokers.—English Paper.

There is a state of things in Holyoke, Mass., that excites the attention of those who are interested in the public schools. Five of those useful institutions have lately been closed, and the school expenses of the town have been reduced at the rate of $4,000 a year. These remarkable results have followed a determination of the Catholic population to educate their children in schools of their own, and at their own cost—which they seem to have an indisputable right to do, if they like. The other tax-payers appear to labor under an impression that they can stand it; but the seceders, who pay their money and take their choice in the educational line, are inclined to complain a little because the antagonism of the State law and their church law obliges them to pay two moneys for one choice—which is unpleasant, no doubt, but probably irremediable, until they succeed in conquering their prejudices against a school system independent of sectarianism.—Chicago Evening Post.

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life: the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly recession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not incurious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, anti-theological novel; its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, didactically or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is emphatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by C. D. D. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY," together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Saver, Alexander Loe, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 35 cents each.

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Controversy Between Religion and Science.

BY PROF. F. W. CLARKE, OF BOSTON.

[Concluded.]

Now this evidence offered by intuition, although of incalculable value to some individuals, is to a very great extent worthless for demonstrating the truth or falsity of any proposition. For intuitions of this kind are easily tampered with. They can be made to order in periods of great religious excitement; and some "experiences" which certain of the faithful regard as overwhelming are known to be mere outgrowths of nervous disorder. Suppose a man of science, having no intuitions of his own, should attempt to shape his belief by those of other people. He would see sects and clans of religionists, each with its special catalogue of "experiences," contradicting and quarrelling with each other. Methodists, Baptists, Spiritists, Ecstasies of all kinds, Hindu, Fakirs, and many others, all rush at him with sets of intuitions many of which are radically opposed. What is he to do? If he accepts one portion of the "evidence" thus offered, he must reject a second. And if, contrary to our first hypothesis, he should happen to have some intuitions of his own, he might find them in direct antagonism to those of some other person. Moreover, he will see that almost every believer, in reporting his "experiences," adds to them quite unconsciously a variety of deductions which may or may not be properly based upon the supposed facts themselves.

It becomes necessary, then, for the truly scientific mind to distrust much of the evidence thus offered by intuition. Even his own intuitions, if he has any, cannot receive from him implicit intellectual faith. For he cannot with certainty say that his are all right and those of some other person all wrong. Such arrogance would be unscientific. Accordingly the man of science carefully compares all the evidence of this sort, and sees what intuitions, apart from the deductions drawn from them, are common to the majority of mankind. Having thus sifted the data, he compares this clear grain with the facts and established doctrines of natural science, and gradually attains to an approximate solution of each great problem. Instead of trying to reach the unattainable, he is contented to get as near certainty as he can.

Here we begin to get a glimpse of the true relations between faith and reason, and at the very heart of the scientific method of dealing with religious questions. Almost every man of science must hold some theological opinions, since a certain amount of religious thought is necessary to every intelligent mind. He accordingly begins by setting his reason carefully at work to weigh every problem simply upon its merits, and so finds which side is best supported by evidence. This side is probably the true one, although certainty is not reached. But the investigator, in regard to many of these questions, must find peace of mind somewhere. And here faith comes into play. Like oil upon water, it quiets the troubles of the reason, and gives the latter rest. Reason goes forward like a pioneer, and finds a home for faith. Better homes, and surer resting-places may be found by-and-by, and yet both reason and faith gain contentment for the present day.

But faith modifies faith. Faith in one doctrine may either prevent or necessitate faith in another. Thus faith, being the index of the mind's inmost belief, grows by a sort of evolution, and follows the path of a logic which is sometimes difficult to express. How, then, let us ask, does the faith of the scientific man in Nature's revelations affect his theological belief? In entering upon this inquiry we must be careful not to transcend the present limits of physical science. We are to discuss, not the probable position of the scientist a hundred years hence, but his actual attitude to-day. Now, however it may be by-and-by, a true student of Nature may have faith in God, in moral law, in immortality, based upon evidence which seems to him entirely distinct from that upon which the creed of material science rests. He may believe in these things, and strengthen his belief with arguments drawn from the world of the senses. His faith in a Divine Being may be supported with the argument from design, which he of all men can frame the most skillfully. He may conceive of mind as essentially distinct from matter, and, recognizing the permanence of the one, draw from it an analogy to prove the immortality of the other. These doctrines he may believe, and still be at war with many theologians. His faith in science may so modify his beliefs regarding the relations between the world of matter and the world of mind, the visible universe and the invisible Deity, as to render them adverse to the majority of creeds and churches. The character of this modification is the proper aim of our inquiry.

Two beliefs are fundamental in the creed of science: a belief in the orderliness of Nature, and a belief in the capacity of the human mind to understand it. "Order is Heaven's first law," and the supremacy of intellect its second. Without these beliefs no science could exist. No regular sequences could be studied. No true reasoning from observed facts would be possible. The faith of man in natural law, his expectation that the sun will rise to-morrow because it rose to-day, his confidence in gravitation, and in the beneficent effects of warmth and light, are but expressions of these beliefs. The thinker puts these articles of his creed even more strongly than the every day man of the world. He cannot conceive of existence independent of law. Wisdom, truth, rectitude, are to him but synonyms of law. Law, regular and inviolate, governs the order of all things. It is the frame work of the universe; the ruler of all change; an essential portion of God himself. Perfect law is perfect love, wisdom, and beneficence; and these are Deity.

Armed with this firm belief in law, the man of science investigates Nature. Gradually he brings within the domain of regularity, phenomena which seem to prove the existence of the wildest disorder. Chaos ceases to exist. Rain, for which savages pray, is found to be subject to systematic conditions as much as the revolutions of the planets. Sickness is traced to filth, carelessness, and foul air. Insanity is no longer ascribed to diabolical possession, nor are hysterical fits attributed to witchcraft. But science has made all these forward steps in spite of the opposition of theological experts. The ascription of physical evils to demons, witches, or special Divine wrath, was long upheld by preachers, in the face of accumulating evidence. Some of these religionists still cling to the old medieval faith. Prayers for fruitful seasons, for the recovery of the sick, for abundant harvests, the abatement of pestilence, the aversion of calamities, are daily offered up in all Christian lands. And when a man of science recently suggested a test for the efficacy of such prayers, churchmen all over the world scouted the notion as profane. "Believe without proof," said they. "Prove first and believe afterwards," said science.

But the clerical party, as usual, has mistaken the attitude of science, and accused it of trying to abolish prayer. Science, they say, should not meddle with such sacred matters; let it stick to its own business, and leave morals alone; it ought not to pry into the communion of man with God. But they forget that this question of prayer is twofold. Prayer may be studied with reference either to its moral or its physical effects; and perhaps it may be proved to have no physical merit whatever, without its moral value being in the least impaired. It may bring consolation and peace to the mind, comfort the weary and distressed, strengthen the weak of faith, and yet be unable to raise a straw from the ground or change the direction of a sunbeam. It may help the soul, but leave the body unaided. With all this the man of science has little to do. His tests do not touch these questions. He may even believe most firmly in prayer, and still have no confidence in its asserted medicinal powers. As a man of science, he wishes to know whether prayer has any physical value. And the question is only to be answered by physical evidence and physical tests. These tests must be applied. Attempts to evade them, either by denunciation or otherwise, are weak, futile, and demonstrative of scanty faith on the part of the pious objectors. Science has shown sickness to be the result of purely natural laws which, in the long run, work directly for universal good. Will a wise Deity interfere with their action because of the prayers of a few men? Can we expect God to gratify our wishes by thwarting the laws which he himself instituted? This the scientific man is disinclined to believe. It may be so, but he demands the proof of it. Until that proof shall be forthcoming, he withholds belief.

This faith in perfect order renders the scientist a sceptic about miracles. They are so contrary to the commonly observed sequences of events that he cannot easily believe in them. He cannot prove that the miraculous is impossible, perhaps, but he can show that his doubts have good foundations. But of course his attitude towards the miraculous depends much upon the definition of "miracle." If a subversion of law is meant by it, then science rejects the conception once for all as unworthy of a moment's consideration. If, on the other hand, a miracle is defined as an interposition of higher laws, guided by wise volition, science admits that a fair field is opened for discussion.

Well, then, according to this second definition, miracles may have occurred. The dead may have been raised, the blind made to see, water transformed to wine. Saints may have proved their merit, not by kind and generous deeds, but by feats of magic; and the uncleaned toe-nails of dirty martyrs may have cured diseases which baffled all the disciples of Galen. Science cannot prove that such events never occurred. But it can pronounce them quite unworthy of belief except upon the very strongest and most detailed evidence; and it can pile up probabilities against them more rapidly than proofs can be accumulated in their behalf.

As a general rule, extraordinary events need extraordinary evidence to prove them real. The mind naturally demands less testimony for common than for uncommon things. Were a friend to tell me that he had seen a man fall from a fourth-story window into the street, I should not hesitate to believe him. But if he said that the man leaped from the street into a fourth-story window, then, no matter how truthful my friend might habitually be, I should demand the strongest of corroborative testimony before I could lend credit to the tale. Doubt would be a duty under the circumstances. No one but the most credulous of ninnies could believe at once without questioning. The same policy of caution is needed in testing the reality of alleged miracles, and is practised in most instances by nearly all intelligent minds. Even the men who believe most firmly in the miracles of eighteen centuries ago are very critical with regard to marvels said to occur in our own times. With these people it is reasonable to suppose that the sun stood still for the convenience of a Jewish army, but absurd to believe that men can be made to float in the air without visible support to-day. With miracles as with mountains, it is "distance lends enchantment to the view."

With regard to the evidence by which the truth of the miraculous is to be established, there is plainly but one kind: the evidence of human testimony. A miracle is something so far out of the ordinary course of events that no a priori reasoning can help us much towards belief in it. It stands alone, to be positively verified only by eye-witnesses. We who are often deceived by our own senses must put our trust in the senses of others. "Hearsay evidence" is all we have to go by. From this we must eliminate the "personal error" of the observer. Admitting his truthfulness, we must consider whether he was critically competent. Did he scrutinize closely, and weigh with care; or was he hastily and blindly credulous, like the victims of fortune-tellers and quack doctors to-day? We all of us know people of undoubted honesty whose testimony concerning the supernatural is absolutely worthless. They are so easy to convince that any charlatan has them in his power. No absurdity is too great for their belief. Then again we must ask whether our witness may not have been too partial. Did the alleged miracle tend to confirm his prejudices? Was he anxious to believe? For it is much easier to accept a miracle which harmonizes with our views than one which militates against them. When we read of a championship match in miracles, we must ask whether our account was written by Moses or by an Egyptian. One side may tell one story, and another, another.

If now we demand extraordinary evidence for the extraordinary event, we have first to settle all these questions about our observer. He must be a man of unusual candor, intelligence, impartiality, judgment, and acuteness. In order to command our attention, he must give us full details concerning the miracle which he describes, and refer us to good witnesses other than himself. His mere assertion that a miracle took place is not enough. The assertion must be supported before we can scientifically believe. But unfortunately there is no miracle on record whose chronicler is known to fulfil all these requisites. In most instances miracles are cited in proof of certain particular opinions; are the credentials of some saint or martyr, and have been recorded by pious believers in the doctrine to be established. Too often the relation comes to us at second-hand, like the "authentic cases" of ghost-seeing of to-day. The recorder is partial, credulous, and blinded by enthusiasm. He tells us not only what he has seen, but also what he has heard; and is not over-nice with regard to the sources of his information. An avowed partisan, he is daunted by no improbabilities. Perhaps he has been reared in some land where a belief in magic is almost universal. All these considerations, and many more, tend to vitiate his testimony.

Let us specialize a little, and see how the scientific man stands towards the popular faith. Many of the most strenuous defenders of the miraculous limit their belief. They practically assert that miracles never occurred except among the ancient Jews, and never occur to-day. The miracles of the Bible are all real; everything else is spurious. The wonders recorded of Apollonius of Tyana, and of the great multitude of Christian hermits and devotees, are nothing but silly tales. The spiritists of to-day are all impostors. Our miracles, which sustain our theories, are alone genuine. Go! seems to have lost the power which he exerted of old.

In this attitude the man of science cannot stand. Faith, with him, lives not apart from perfect fairness. If he is to believe in miracles at all, he must compare the various records, and accept by preference those which are best supported by evidence. Although there is not one miracle which can command belief, some are better sustained than others. Those claimed by the modern spiritists are perhaps the best vouched for. We know the witnesses personally, and have every detail given, yet find scepticism necessary. So much is imposture that we are forced into excessive caution. We must not let jugglery deceive us. We know how easily a credulous man is self-deluded. Sensorial impressions affect him, and psychological marvels excite his wonder. We doubt his testimony, even while admitting his honor. We cannot believe these tales, we say, until we have seen and experienced for ourselves. They may be true, but more evidence is necessary. Even if real, the seeming miracles may be misinterpreted.

Going back a century or two in time, we come to the miracles worked at the tomb of Deacon Paris. Here are marvels vouched by the affidavits of many eye-witnesses. The sick were miraculously healed in great numbers. Yet we doubt. Wonderful things happened, beyond question; but were they miracles? The witnesses were blinded, and probably exaggerated very much. We are therefore reluctant to accept their conclusions.

The farther back into history we pursue our researches, the more abundant we shall find our materials become. At every shrine, by every holy man or woman, miracles were performed. The atmosphere was charged with the miraculous. If half the tales were true, sickness should have been abolished during the dark ages, since the invalid needed only to touch some relic or visit some holy place in order to be cured. There were miracles by the thousand, and yet none was supported by the evidence we demand. More assertions are given us, and nothing more. Legends, and popular tales, are transformed into realities. The belief in miracles went hand in hand with a faith in magic, witchcraft, ghosts, fairies, dragons, giants, and vampires.

After awhile we get into Scriptural times. Here are marvels indeed! Thousands of intelligent men and women who laugh at spiritism as absurd, and reject the traditions of the Romish Church, believe devoutly in these miracles of the sacred age. How are they supported? By the extraordinary evidence which common sense demands? By testimony stronger than the volumes of affidavits to the miracles at the tomb of Paris? By witnesses better competent to observe than those who testify to modern cases of stigmata? Do we even know who the witnesses were? No. Every requisite necessary for the demonstration of a miracle is wanting. Certain writers, who are practically anonymous so far as our real knowledge of their identity is concerned, and of whose powers of observation we know nothing, make certain strange statements. They say that miracles occurred, and we find that some other people believed the stories at the time. But whether these writers saw the miracles or only heard of them, we do not know. No details are given, and there is no corroborative testimony. We know, however, that the records were written among a people believing in magic, and that, however pure of mind and lofty of purpose the authors may have been, they were both partial and enthusiastic. Lacking, then, the extraordinary evidence for the extraordinary events, we say, not that the alleged miracles never happened, but that we have no adequate grounds for believing in them. This is the true scientific position. Were the man of science to accept these miracles of Scripture, he would feel bound to accept also the wonderful cures at the tomb of Paris, and the mysterious perturbations of furniture claimed by the mediums of to-day. These modern marvels are much more strongly sustained than those of the ancient Hebrews. The latter are even less credible than the strange stories told at the witchcraft trials of two centuries ago.

It would scarcely be worth while to go much farther in a paper of this scope. Ecclesiastics and men of science come into collision at so many points that volumes have been filled with their controversies. Each of these points, properly treated, would need a book by itself. My purpose has been to illustrate the antagonism rather than to discuss it exhaustively, and to show in what attitude science really stands towards religion. The thorough scientific man cares solely for the truth. He has no feeling of opposition towards religion as such. His hostility is directed at certain unscientific doctrines advanced by certain unscientific men. These doctrines, which are commonly taught in connection with various theological ideas, and even confounded with them, stand opposed to what he knows to be the truth. Therefore they must be overthrown. Doubtless the scientist and the theologian often misunderstand each other, and wrangle about mere terms. Only, the misunderstanding is most frequently on the ecclesiastical side of the house. The Churchman, seeing a minor point doubted, is apt to feel that his whole system is in danger. The Church held a belief in witchcraft to be essential to religion; but witchcraft fell. The clergy thought that madmen were possessed by devils and should be burned alive, until science taught otherwise. And to-day the priesthood asserts that supernatural agencies can control the order of Nature. "Not proven," says science. The scientific man proved that the world was not created in six days, and ecclesiastics accused him of teaching that God did not create it at all. In every case the men who have put the assertions of Hebrew literature against the truths of science have had to give way. Mere assertions could not stand against evidence. At every step in the controversies which have arisen, the Church seems to have exhibited wilful stupidity. It has not only misinterpreted science, but it has failed to understand its own limitations. It has indeed "become as a little child,"—a mere infant reaching out to grasp the moon.

But the main difficulties have been due to differences of method. The sects have all followed vicious and clumsy intellectual plans. They assume too much in their premises, and verify too little. In consequence they contradict each other like the blind men who visited the elephant. Science, on the contrary, verifies everything as far as verification is possible. It strives to account for the phenomena of Nature by rational processes, and puts but little faith in dreams, visions, and inexplicable marvels. It prefers suspended to snap judgments, and absolute doubt to irrational though comforting belief. It is knowledge in a state of evolution. Growth and development are essential to its being. Religion must become science before it can conquer the world. For science is truth, and all truth is unity.

The New York Sun heads its account of the Ministerial meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that city not long ago, thus: "Real old-fashioned hell—sad falling off in the Methodist Church—going to heaven on sheet music—eternal damnation not enough preached."—Tribune Blade.

There was once an old woman who, in answer to a visiting almoner's inquiries as to how she did, said: "Oh, sir, the Lord is very good to me; I've lost my husband and eldest son, and my youngest daughter, and I'm half blind, and I can't sleep or move about for the rheumatics; but I've got two teeth left in my head, and, praise and bless his holy name, they're opposite each other!" It has been said this old woman was thankful for small mercies.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XVII.

CONTAINS EXPLANATIONS AND CONFIDENCES.

It might be that Paul's reception by his grandparents involved such a social contrast to what he had quitted, as to incite a desire for a warmer welcome; or simply because he wanted to see Richard Sabin as soon as possible; or that he was influenced by another object, which the reader will easily surmise: but, whatever the reason, on the day after his arrival in London, he took a cab and was driven to Great James Street, where he found both Dick and the red-bearded Mops, who hailed his appearance with that rough, hearty, unpretentious kindness which men generally bestow upon a returned friend and ex-invalid. It was with extreme pleasure that he responded to their salutations; and, seating himself in the old familiar room again, surveyed the old familiar pipes, prints, and pictures, and sniffed up the ever-predominant atmosphere of "turps" and tobacco; while smoking their accustomed calumets, Richard and Mr. Humphries beamed upon him from opposite chairs. One of the delights attendant on absence, or a holiday, is the getting back to our accustomed associations; as the satisfaction of convalescence is not a little augmented by one's friends' congratulations.

As soon as he had heard Paul's account of his illness, recovery, and country sojourn, Mr. Humphries uprose and departed to his own room, leaving Sabin and his visitor together; when, after some further conversation, the latter naturally inquired about Dick's interview with Mr. Wheeler (alluded to in his letter), and whether anything had transpired therein of interest to himself.

"Well, not much," the other responded. "He came here one morning and introduced himself, having got my address at Newman Street, whither he had been invited by Kitty and Frank, as I think you know. It seems he had promised your governor a personal report of you; and missing you on one occasion, and finding you floored by illness on another, thought it worth while hunting me up, just to ask a few questions. I gave him a highly favorable description of you, of course. I thought, from the drift of his inquiries, that he wanted to know whether you'd be likely to have any objections to going to America; upon which point I left him in no doubt whatever. Perhaps your father distrusted the shelving of his message, unless it reached the person most concerned. Wheeler was evidently acquainted with his history and aware of the family peculiarities." Richard spoke rather drily, having neither forgotten nor forgiven Mr. and Mrs. Gower's descent upon the house of Sabin.

"I wish I had seen him," said Paul; which remark set his friend criticising the American's appearance and behavior. "He was very civil," he said, in conclusion, "but I didn't much like him; he seemed so confoundedly hard-natured and business-like—just the kind of man who'd set his foot on anybody's face if it lay in his way, or would help him to climb upwards. If your governor resembles him—to be sure there's no reason why he should—I don't fancy you'll get on very well together."

The conversation then naturally turning on the young men's plans of emigration, Dick frankly admitted that he was no more prepared with money for the expenses of the voyage than he had been a month ago; and, perhaps in consequence (only he didn't say so), broached a proposition relative to the means of transit, which Paul had not, until then, contemplated.

"Now you've got a hundred and odd pounds in pocket," he said, "of course you'd be wanting to go first-class, in a steamer, like a swell. Well, I shan't be able to afford that, or don't care to. I should prefer roughing it and taking one's chances of it's proving more amusing. The steerage of a liner ought to be a picturesque place for sketching and free-and-easy observation of one's fellow-passengers. I'm never sea-sick, you know, and should like a whole month or more of salt water—it must be such perfect loafing, with no remorse to follow, because you can't do anything else. Besides, there's a kind of impropriety in making a ten days' jump from the old world to the new—from heavy and respectable and particularly over-civilized and self-righteous old England into democratic and bumptious and, I imagine, rather underdone America. Let's have time to realize the fact that there's three thousand miles between them; and that Columbus really did something."

"What will Harry Franklin say?" demanded Paul, rather taken aback by the proposition; for, as his friend suggested, his self-esteem had risen a little with the possession of money, and Louisiana contingencies.

"Oh, he'll be willing enough." And here there ensued an amicable controversy, which came to no decision worth mentioning. It was presently terminated by Paul's inviting Richard to dine with him at an old-fashioned tavern in Holborn (familiar to the latter), where he ordered the best repast that the resources of the establishment could produce; and where the friends stayed for two hours, during which time the founder of the feast experienced a fearful pleasure, such as one might suppose attaches to the commission of wilful and agreeable sin, for he knew that he was expected home to the family meal. But with the greater part of fifty pounds in his pocket, and a latent sense of injury, which his return to the house of his grandparents seemed to revive in his memory, he felt inclined to assert his independence.

He longed, of course, to ascertain the effect of Mr. and Mrs. Gower's interference in Newman Street, and probably hoped that Richard would volunteer some information on the subject; but Sabin said not a word until, towards the close of the entertainment, Paul ventured on a timid question, when his friend spoke out with his customary frankness.

"Well, it has blown over now, though it wasn't pleasant while it lasted. I never saw the governor so riled in my life—he was actually ill-tempered about it—savage as a bear with a sore head towards everybody; just as if they'd been in a conspiracy to lower the dignity of the family and put him in a humiliating position. You know he never thinks or means harm to a living soul, so it was particularly d—d hard to be dropped on to in such a confoundedly unexpected and undeserved manner. He has forgotten rather than forgiven it, now, and—I don't want to hurt your feelings, Paul, but it was an infernal shame and an outrage; and after what has happened, you see, it won't do for you to show up at the house any more."

"I don't intend to," groaned poor Paul; "but Kate—what does she say? She doesn't blame me for this wretched business, I hope?"

"Nobody blames you, old boy," Sabin answered, with much kindness. "We understand all about it. We were all sorry for your illness; and when I couldn't call at Sam's, to inquire about you, Mills did. I hope you didn't think I neglected you, eh?" Dick drank a glass of wine, hesitated a little, and continued.

"About Kate and yourself, it's none of my business. You know best how you parted, and whether it's all up between you or not. I believe she has been devilish miserable ever since, and I think it served her right. I know the old lady scolded her infernally. She's going into the country for a change—to Thorpe Parva—and, if she likes it, will stay there for some time. I don't want to interfere, or to hurt your feelings; but if I were you I'd give it up altogether. It won't pay, you may bet your life of it. She is sorry, now, and hurt and humiliated; but crying won't wash out nature; and when she's got over it, she'll sink the chapel going—for she's taken to that—and be just the same as ever. She's ever so much older than you, though she don't admit it. Character is the one thing that never alters. Kate always was a coquette, and always will be; she used to try it on with my schoolfellows, when she could hardly toddle, and set them to fisticuffs about her. Look here, now; if you come together again, what follows? You are going to America for an indefinite time—all your life, probably; well, if you can depend on your own constancy (and they say the Yankee girls are deucedly pretty) are you sure of her? You'll write letters to one another until you're both sick and tired of them and of the business altogether. It'll be what the women call a long engagement (and they are quite right in objecting to 'em), with the dead certainty of, at least, Kitty's string of it and throwing you over the first opportunity that presents itself."

"It's clear that you're not in love, Dick," answered Paul, ruefully. "Your counsel is terribly matter-of-fact, and not at all complimentary to your sister."

"It's kindly intended," Sabin said, flushing a little; "and I don't mean to say there are not girls who would wait ever so long for a fellow, and be worth the waiting for; but is Kate one of 'em? She might have been, perhaps, if she had been brought up better. All of us might have been different. Paul, old boy, they've kept an uncommonly strict hand over you at home, but it may be that you are not so much the worse for it, after all. I've been thinking that more children go to the bad through indulgence than severity. I wish the governor had thrashed some of us into better habits."

A sentiment so foreign to his friend's ordinary opinions rather surprised Paul, who did not know that, while he spoke, Dick was evolving from the depths of his own consciousness an entirely imaginary and perhaps impossible Richard Sabin—one who might have been worthy to aspire to the love of an equally ideal young lady, whose outward appearance resembled Ruth Gower. Paul's words had revived certain impressions, received in a brief interview already described in these pages, and induced a twinge of humility and a stricter moral estimate—lasting, perhaps, five minutes. Probably, too, Dick was not unwilling to allow himself to be diverted from the task of disparaging his sister, and persuading his friend out of his passion for her.

"However, it's of no use regretting it now," he continued, refilling his glass and lighting another cigar. "Let's talk about something else—wasn't it very cold in the country?" And though Paul made one or two efforts at returning to the subject nearest his heart, Richard quietly evaded them, and nothing more could be extracted from him concerning it, during the rest of the interview.

Paul promised himself amends from Mills who, he knew, would prove as communicative as could be desired. With this object, after he had accompanied Sabin back to his lodgings (whither Dick was obliged to return, in order to resume work on a big lithographic stone, to the completion of which he was pledged by a certain hour), he betook himself straightway to Soho Square, hoping to find the poor drawing-master at Mr. Bligh's office; as it happened to be one of the days upon which he gave lessons to the pupils. But he was too late; the Holborn banquet had been protracted too long, and Mills had departed; nor could the very friendly reception of the young gentlemen of their late comrade make amends to him for the disappointment. So it only remained for him to return home by way of Newman Street, that he might have the melancholy satisfaction of looking at the house fraught with so many recollections to him (there were two quart pots ornamenting the area-railings), and from which he felt as if he had been excluded for years; after which he went back to his grandfather's, expecting a scolding or at least inquiry as to the cause of his absence, and rather inclined to mutiny and put forth a general declaration of independence. But the old lady only gave him a queer, scrutinizing look, asked if he had dined, and talked of indifferent matters during the rest of the evening.

It was not until some days had elapsed that he succeeded in obtaining an interview with his humble friend; when, partly in the course of a walk about Soho Square, partly at their accustomed coffee-house, Mills confirmed in detail what Paul had already learned from Richard Sabin. Miss Kate, he said, had altered very much and become very religious. She went to chapel with her mother on Wednesday evenings, as well as twice on Sundays, and had joined a Bible-class. Likewise—and here the listener pricked up his ears—she had discarded Mr. Mifflin. He came to the house as usual after the catastrophe, and seemed as much in love as ever, but Kate sedulously avoided him; and, under the combined influences of her disfavor, the advances of "the kitten" (who thought it a good opportunity to secure the transfer of his affections towards herself), and old Sabin's newly-developed distrust of young men visitors, Mr. Mifflin's calls had declined, until they finally ceased altogether. He had taken his farewell in a most dismal and heart-rending copy of verses which, confided to Frank for delivery, had been by him adapted to the tune of "The King of the Cannibal Islands," and sung all over the house; and ultimately devoted, in its paper form, to making a kite for little Arty.

Paul could have hugged Mills for this intelligence. The thrill of pleasure which he felt at the news told him, for the first time, how much latent hope he had secretly cherished. Yes! he loved her still; though his passion had been sorely bruised, wounded, and humiliated. He was eager to believe that she had repented of the past and would amend for the future; acting in all things, as became her true self—of course the ideal of his imagination. He attached but little importance to her religious impressions, thinking, with her brother, that they would prove merely temporary. But what did she say about him? he anxiously demanded. Here Mills' information was less satisfactory, though he strove to render it as agreeable as possible.

She had really been very sorry for his illness, attributing it to her own misconduct on that night; and blaming herself so severely that even Tib desisted from the sisterly duty of heaping additional coals of fire upon her head; and, turning sharp round, justified her vehemently and abused Mr. Mifflin, imputing to his unlucky appearance in the house, and passion for Kate, the whole of the mischief. She had cried a good deal, and pronounced herself a wicked, miserable girl, quite unworthy of Paul's affection or even of his friendship. She had wished herself dead—which of course meant out of her present trouble—or that he had never known her. She had gone about the house looking so wretched that everybody pitied her, and her parents feared for her health, which John Sabin proposed to improve by the country trip already alluded to by Richard; while his wife recommended Calvinistic Methodism as the one thing needful for insuring her daughter's welfare, both in this life and that which is to come. And the latter, Mills said, she certainly thought more of than of anything else: she had regained her composure, but was much sobered in disposition; caring only for her family duties and chapel. Finally, she considered that the "engagement" between Paul and herself had been broken off, to the advantage of both parties. She was afraid that she could not make him happy; they were unsuited to each other and, perhaps, had better not meet again. She hoped that he had forgiven and would forget her; and had no doubt that, some day, he would discover somebody more capable of appreciating his worth and devotion. For her part, she expected to be an old maid and was quite resigned to that destiny.

The natural upshot of all which was that Paul went home and wrote a long letter to her, expressive of his most ardent, most unchangeable affection; and, next day, committed it to Mills for delivery.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

THE EVIDENCE.—The Bible contains the law of the most high God. It founds its claim to this divine origin on the harmony of its facts with the records of universal history, on the moral character of its inspired penmen, on the sublime yet simple majesty of its style, on the excellence of its doctrines, on the purity of its morals, on the rapidity with which its truths were originally promulgated under circumstances the most unpromising, and on the evidence of indisputable miracles and prophecy.—Sunday Republic.

CONFESSION OF MRS. LYDIA SHERMAN, THE MURDERESS.—It is about six weeks since I began to feel oppressed inwardly; to have an inward struggle; sometimes was pressure on my heart. I felt bad, and I felt as though I wanted to tell, but I could not make up my mind to do it. I kept feeling so bad, and I thought I could give all up to Christ and confess to him and all would be right, and I would not let the world know anything about it. That is what I thought.

I LAY AWAKE NIGHTS

thinking about it; could not sleep and could not eat. The jailor's wife will tell you that I did not eat anything. Finally one night I made up my mind that I would give myself up to Christ and confess everything and I did. I knelt down and said I was sorry, and asked him to forgive me. I felt better then; I felt that the burden was gone, and that I was forgiven. When I felt that I must confess it to the world, I felt it was my duty to do that, that others might be warned. I felt that I could not be forgiven unless that was done. In the morning I called to Mrs. Webster. (This was on Thursday, the 23rd day of December.)

OPENING HER HEART TO WEBSTER.

I called her in and said, "Mrs. Webster, I am a very wicked woman," and she said she guessed I was not very wicked now.

I said, "But I have been a very wicked woman, haven't I?"

She said, "I know you have been, but I think you have become a good woman."

I said that I felt that I wanted to let everybody know how bad I had been, and that I could not be forgiven unless I did.

She spoke to Mr. Webster, and he came in the next morning and asked me if I wanted to make a confession, and I said I did. Then of course I told him. After I made up my mind I felt better, and after I told him all the OPPRESSION WAS GONE FROM MY HEART, and ever since I have been perfectly contented and my mind is at ease. I feel that I know that God has forgiven me, and that after I am done here I shall have a home there with him. I made up my mind that I would give up everything in this world and think nor care for anything here.

I think it was on Christmas that Mrs. Crumb came here to talk to me, and that it was she and her talking to me and praying with me that helped me to do this; and a great deal is owing to Mr. Lutz. He was here on Christmas day. Mrs. Crumb was the means of my making up my mind finally to GIVE MYSELF UP TO CHRIST.

I would like the world to know how I feel. I feel that I have given up all hold on the world, and that I have given Christ my heart, and that my trust is in him. Years ago I was a professor of religion, and always thought I had religion, but I know now that I never was a Christian. I always used to think I was, but I know I was not, or would not have done as I did.

It being remarked to her that her quarters in the State-prison would not be as pleasant as those she had occupied, she remarked that she did not care; she had placed herself entirely in God's hands, and was ready to bear what he placed upon her. She also said she wanted Christian people to know how she felt, and not to have them paint her case as bad as some murderers.—New York Herald.

TO STOCKHOLDERS OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

I wish to thank those stockholders of the Index Association who have sent me, without any request of mine, their proxies for the Annual Meeting. It is my full purpose to attend that meeting; and I hope there to form an opinion—which I have not yet allowed myself to do—upon the main questions at issue. Should I be absolutely prevented from going, I propose to entrust these proxies to the most impartial and honest substitute I can find. I shall avoid those now engaged in the controversy, if possible; for though they may be honest, they can hardly be impartial.

Where instructions have been given, I shall obey them; where otherwise, I shall use my own best judgment. Should I be compelled to send a substitute, it will be with the same directions. But I would earnestly urge every stockholder to attend the Annual Meeting, if possible; and meanwhile to withhold his judgment upon the points at issue between the contending parties. It is already evident that these cannot be fairly investigated, except on the spot.

NEWPORT, R. I., April 9, 1873.

The poor women of Utah have at least one right granted to them by the laws of that territory—that of obtaining a divorce for ten dollars, which the husband has to pay.

Rev. O. B. Frothingham is to write a new life of Theodore Parker. This he is to do with the approval and coöperation of Mrs. Parker. It is a noble life in the hands of a most fit biographer.

A lady—Miss Smiley—has been preaching to large audiences in some of the Orthodox pulpits in Boston. How can Boston Orthodoxy forget that their "Holy Bible" says, through the lips of St. Paul, "Let your women keep silence in the churches"? Miss Smiley is described as having "beautiful eyes" and a "sweet voice." Ah, perhaps these are what made the Orthodox ministers of our modern Athens forget brother Paul's injunction! In the interest of the infallible Bible, we appeal from these sentimental but creant clergy to Rev. Dr. Justin D. Fulton.

M'Elhane, who was hung quite recently in Cambridge, Mass., for wife-murder, partook of the "Lord's Supper" just before execution, listened with great pleasure to the singing of the hymns, "Jesus, lover of my soul," and "Just as I am, without one plea," and received from the attendant clergyman the blessed assurance of "salvation by the blood of Jesus." What a murderous and sanguinary affair all through! In the first place, a murder nineteen hundred years ago; and then these two recent murders—one by a man crazed with passion, the other by the State of Massachusetts in its coolest moment. The first and the last took place, one to condone and the other to punish the second. Thus both Church and State make one blood-stain wash out another. And all this is religion and law, Christianity and civilization!

THE UNBELIEF OF CHRISTIANS.

It is, perhaps, natural that those who belong to the Christian communion should charge those who do not with being infidels and unbelievers. So long and so blindly have Christians taken it for granted that Christianity is the sum and acme of true belief, that it is next to intellectually impossible for them to conceive or allow that those who prefer to roam the universe for truth, rather than be shut up in any small fold, can have anything like substantial or satisfying convictions. Christians seem to suppose that the special vocation of so-called infidels is to deny, not to affirm; that the genius of infidelity runs to disbelief, not at all to belief. And they really would appear to regard with great pity (when not with horror) every one who isn't a "Christian," because they think him to be without any sustaining or cheering belief, wandering hopelessly in the outer darkness of denial and scepticism.

Now we speak for one, and say that we do not desire that Christians should pity us. Indeed, we cannot for a moment consent to receive any such thing from them, or allow that we stand at all in need of it. We have never yet seen a Christian who we thought could afford to pity us: our state of belief has always seemed infinitely preferable to theirs. The fact is (to use a homely but expressive phrase), the boot is wholly on the other leg. We feel very sorry for them.

Our sorrow for them is, in the first place, that they have such a poor belief. Again and again have we seen Christians unhappy in their belief; seen them struggling with it as a sleeping man struggles with the nightmare. They held it in fear and dread, not in gladness and joy. There is a terrible alternative involved in the Christian belief, which hangs over the heads of all who hold it, and haunts them with the most painful anxiety and apprehension. That alternative is salvation or perdition—heaven or hell. They cannot succeed in maintaining an absolute certainty as to which will finally be their portion. They greatly hope,—but they also sometimes greatly fear. "Revivals" are gotten up in the Church quite as much to revive and confirm the faith and hope of "believers," as to convict and convert "unbelievers." The faithful are continually falling away from their faith. Now and then the sight of heaven pales on their vision, and the black horrors of hell move like ghosts before their fears. So their agonizing cry is constantly, "O Lord, increase our faith!" We once knew a good woman—almost a perfect saint—who was a devout Methodist, and who generally bore in her heart, with its light reflected on her face, a most serene trust and confidence in her Savior; but often has she confessed to us that sometimes there flitted even across her usually placid mind the appalling doubt if, after all, she were really "saved;" if indeed her "calling and election" were made sure beyond a peradventure. In these moments of suspense of faith, of wavering confidence, her agony of mind and spirit was something pitiful to behold. Thousands and tens of thousands of Christians are like her in this experience, and move our deepest commiseration. Often as a minister, called to cheer and comfort those who were troubled and sorrowful, have we found an infirmity and exility of faith amongst Christians that both amazed and saddened us. And the most "conservative" were often the most unbelieving. The radically-inclined we could generally help to some sure footing: they would at least trust in the firm and benignant laws of the Universe, and be steadied thereby. But those who had put their faith in traditions of sacrament and Bible and Savior were quite apt to go under when the waves of trouble rolled. These things, in which they had always thought they trusted, now seemed so far off, so unreal; while that in which we trusted, they had never learned to confide in. Thus, often, we found the most "Christian" in belief the most difficult to console and cheer.

But we are sorry for Christians not only because of the infirmity of their belief, but also because of their actual unbelief. Not many months ago, we had an opportunity to converse with three very worthy, quite able, and somewhat distinguished Christian clergymen. Our conversation was very frank and free, and they made no concealment of the real state of their belief. One of these clergymen declared, unreservedly, that the facts of physical science had convinced him that the soul of man is not immortal; he said he could not resist the conviction that when he died his mind would cease entirely its operations. Another declared that personally he had the minimum amount of faith in a future life, and but for his faith in the faith of others, especially in that of Christ, he should surrender the belief entirely. The third argued wholly in the direction of materialism, hoping, as he said, to have his faith strengthened in its converse by our counter arguments. All these men took quite a sombre view of this life, and questioned if it did not cost us more than it was worth to us. Yet all these men occupy Christian pulpits, and perform all the functions of a Christian minister. We say we are sorry for them, and such as they, not because of any honest belief or disbelief they have, but because they still cling with all their hopes and fears to Christianity, and have not the boldness to launch off into pure rationalism and take the risks. Christianity will never cure their unbelief, unless they make an utter surrender of their minds to its most ancient and highest authority; nor will it help them to a better or sounder belief, because its method is not the right one. We are sorry for these men, and such as they, because they are on the wrong track, looking in one direction and trying to walk in another; because they hopefully or fearfully linger in the back-parlor of a decaying faith, a crumbling institution, and haven't the wisdom to take their hats and walk out into a larger place.

The Christian Church is honeycombed with doubt and unbelief, both as regards the laity and the clergy. Social levity has eaten into it like a moth, and corrupted it. Growing and irrepressible intelligence has also worked its way among the creeds and dogmas, loosening their hold on the minds of believers. Moreover, those whose dependence is upon the external, the accidental, the traditional, are sure in times of emergency to be disappointed, to lose their footing and come to grief. While those who believe only in the integrity of the Universe, who trust only in the sister laws above and below, who follow only the truth, grow more steady and serene every day; more full of confidence, more full of joy. The most pitiful and alarming unbelief is in the Christian Church, not outside of it.

REASON THE LAW OF LIFE.

Seldom has a single sentence made so deep an impression on my mind as one which several years ago arrested my attention in reading Col. Higginson's admirable translation of Epictetus: "To a reasonable creature, that alone is insupportable which is unreasonable." Reason itself forbids us to endure unreason; at least, if escape is possible at any cost. No price is high to pay for the privilege of living a rational life. No evil is to be compared with that of being driven to violate the dictates of a pure and enlightened intelligence; no good is so exalted as that of obeying just principles in every action, word, and thought.

It was this fundamental fidelity to the law of the universal reason, or, as it was often expressed, "living conformably to Nature," which constituted the glory and essence of the Stoic philosophy. Marcus Aurelius very finely puts it thus: "If thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, but keeping thy divine part pure, as if thou shouldst be bound to give it back immediately; if thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to Nature, and with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy. And there is no man who is able to prevent this." Dr. Zeller epitomizes the principles of Stoicism as follows: "As the Stoics considered that the Reason which governs the world is the general law of all belugs, so they recognized in the moral demand for reason the positive and negative aspects of the Law of God." Hence it is evident that Epictetus uttered the very heart of his philosophic faith when he declared that nothing is insupportable except the intrinsically unreasonable.

But what is "unreasonable"? Whatever contradicts itself, or the order of the universe as discerned by the unperturbed reason of man. Thought must be self-harmonious, and at the same time must harmonize with the universal system of things. The thought which jars with itself or with Nature is unreasonable; and the action which outwardly flows from it is the very incarnation of unreason. Folly, ignorance, superstition, selfishness, injustice, unbridled passions, debased ideals, unregulated lives,—all such things as these are violations of the law of Nature, and come under the irrevocable ban which Nature lays on unreasonableness itself; and they appear to every "reasonable creature" as the only things never to be endured so long as escape is possible. Sorrow can be endured; sickness, pain, poverty, reproach, failure, death itself, can be endured. But submission to essential unreason or wrong (which are the same) is unendurable; and every other evil is preferable in comparison with it.

In an age when material interests loom up in such vast proportions, and command the idolatrous homage of the multitudes, there is great need that the gospel of resistance to unreason should be both preached and practised; for without it the spirit of reform must be extinguished in society at large, and every finer purpose of the individual must be suffocated by the poisonous atmosphere of prevailing corruption. It is a gospel not promulgated in Christian churches, where the spirit of conformity to great established evils has generally found shelter and sympathy. On the contrary, it is a gospel believed in by few and acted upon by fewer still; but it is these few that rescue the generation from moral death, and keep open the road of possibility of purer life. Some have been found in every age who sternly refused to endure unreason, to submit to wrong, to copy the pliant temper of acquiescing cowardice; and in the retrospect mankind are tardily coming to recognize that the gospel they lived by did a work for the race which the fashionable gospel of Christianity shirked and decied. The religion of to-day must be one of vigor, and not passivity,—of positive energy in the furtherance of right and the defeat of wrong, not tame resignation under evils which can be overthrown by courage only. Let the grand rule of Stoicism that the unreasonable is the insupportable strike root into all minds, and no man can paint too bright a picture of the future of the race; but let the timid acquiescence of Christianity in existing evils retain permanently its empire over the world, and I believe that civilization itself will rot slowly back into barbarism. For one, I contemplate no possibility of so lame and impotent a conclusion to the drama of history.

F. E. A.

THE REAL ISSUE.

We have heard till we are satisfied and more than satisfied, till it has become stale as an axiom, that there are really but two systems in religion—the system of authority and the system of liberty. Between "Rome and Reason," we are told, truly enough, there is no resting-place. Either all men must think for themselves or all men must think as they are bid by an imperial power, supposed to govern by Divine sanction. All sincere people find themselves monarchists or republicans; Romanists or Free Religionists.

They who make such assertions admit reason into religion; only in the one case reason soon ends its prerogative—in the other case it continues to maintain it. The system of authority is an intellectual system, fortified by arguments, grounded in philosophy, based on principles of reason, and defensible by strong minds who have read, studied, pondered much. An immense amount of thought has been expended on its construction; an immense force of thought is implied in its stability; and they who accept it may do so with clear conviction of its reasonableness as a religious scheme, and may be quite unconscious of any mental servitude in accepting it. Between them and the rationalists, therefore, the issue is not an issue between reason in religion and no reason in religion; it is rather between one result of reason and another result of reason,—between one intellectual conclusion and another intellectual conclusion. Both systems demand a great deal of thinking on the part of their intelligent advocates. The zany cannot be a good member of either.

It is not fair, however, to suppose the same amount of intellectual interest on both sides. Practically, among average people, and particularly among the converts to Romanism, the issue between the two systems is one between reason and sentiment. It is the intellectual side of rationalism that fascinates, and the pictorial side of Romanism. It is not even mind vs. feeling, for hearty feeling is enlisted in both systems, and is equally fostered by each. It is mind vs. sentiment.

Sitting at dinner a few days ago, with a very intelligent man,—a man of active intelligence, considerable cultivation, large familiarity with current affairs, clear and positive opinions on many subjects,—I was surprised to hear him avow himself a Catholic. His father had been a column in Dr. Bellows' church: he himself had been brought up there; his position in society made him acquainted with a large variety of minds among the clergy. To my question why he was a Catholic, he frankly answered that it was less troublesome: he was not obliged to listen to sermons; he was permitted to listen to fine music; and the whole business of religion was taken off his hands. Religion, in every form, he said, was superstition; and he preferred his superstition picturesque and pure. For doctrines he cared nothing. His spiritual tendencies were not particularly aristocratic; he was a good republican, he was not jealous of the reputation of the priests of his church, and bore pleasantly allusions to archbishops that were not respectful. He simply wanted his mind for other purposes than those of religious credence; and now he had it—before, he had it not.

The conversation was instructive, and made me more eager than ever to employ thought on the problems of religion, and to apply the scientific method to its problems as to all others. It made me thankful, too, that rationalism was, as yet, and that it was likely for some time to come to be, intellectual; that it had few attractions for the dilettante class—no grand churches, no splendid choirs, no impressive ceremonies, pageantries, or pomps, no luxurious resting places for travelling minds, no finalities of opinion, no green pastures, no still waters; that it was on the road, and was therefore not likely to be joined by any of these strolling bands of idlers who infect a caravan because they know it will not proceed far before it reaches a pleasant camping ground.

The strength of every movement is in the active limbs of its advancing members; the weakness of every movement is in the number of its hangers-on. The strength of Romanism is in the powerful minds that maintain it as an intellectual system; its weakness is in the elegant loungers who enroll themselves in its communion because they are tired, or idle, or lackadaisical, or fond of music, or enamored of pictures. If the reliance of Romanism was on these, its conquest would be easy; if the number of these increases at the rate it has been doing for some years past, its conquest will be easy. A small, active, unincumbered phalanx will make short work of a legion of soft sentimentalist. The rationalists—I mean the clear-minded, resolute, energetic rationalists—are not numerous; but if they are sincere, simple, and serenely intellectual, their power will be felt. "There is no such thing," said my Catholic friend, "as a reasonable religion: when reason comes in, religion goes out. All religion is superstitious." If it is, said I in reply, then let it go. Let us have no religion. Let truth take the place of it. Let the issue lie between truth and religion. Truth without religion will be better than religion without truth; and in a struggle betwixt the two I cannot doubt which will prevail, nor whose victory will be most beneficent for mankind.

LONDON LETTER.

ALMS-GIVING—RAGGED AND CHARITY SCHOOLS—FREE SCIENTIFIC LECTURES TO THE POOR—MATTHEW AND WILLIAM ARNOLD.

LONDON, March 17, 1873.

It will, I suspect, be some day a question that will be much argued, whether in completely civilized and advanced societies anything can exist corresponding to the ancient virtue of "charity." Of course etymologically it must always exist, for caritas can alone make a society anywise different from the herding together of animals or men for mutual protection; but, in the ordinary sense of the word, does not charity mean that one is a mere dependent on the mere bounty of another; and does such a relation bless either him who gives or him who bestows? The late Archbishop Whately used to thank God that he had never given a penny to a beggar, though often sorely tempted so to do; and consequently had never been the means of encouraging any one to remain on the street. He spoke the voice of his country's determination, that the disabled shall have asylums as their just due, and paupers shall go to prison or to State-provided work. We have had here hitherto what is called out-door relief, but the party opposed to it has become strong enough to secure the application, in an increasing number of parishes, of the labor test; and it must presently be the case here that in no instance whatever shall any poor person enjoy that for which he or she has performed no service. There are fewer beggars every year in our streets, and more robberies. Meanwhile, one reads with a certain wonder the exquisite chapters which fill Oriental Scriptures concerning charity to the poor, to strangers, and wanderers. They were written clearly at a period when society was not yet organized on ideas of justice and human rights, and men had to depend rather upon the mercy of others than on any claims they might have. Not long ago I visited, in company with a number of antiquarians, an old abbey. The clergyman gave us a good archaeological account of it, and then invited us to a repast which his wife had spread among the ruins. As we were taking our leave, a learned antiquarian thanked our hosts for their kindness, and observed that there was something almost pathetic in the fact that the clergyman and his wife had been renewing that day the custom which had existed when abbays were built, but had decayed with their ruin, of giving food and kind discourse to the traveller on his way.

But that old idea of giving aid without hope of repayment, which the more scientific organization of society has so far driven away that one does not now drink even the "stirrup-cup" without giving a fee (not exacted but looked for and accepted) for the old charity so celebrated by poets, still lingers in regions where the State has not yet brought its statutes to bear. And until now this has been eminently the case in the matter of the education of the poor. Unquestionably the education of the children of the poor as a charity has failed. The great mass of the population is ignorant, and the State has had to come in with its rates, its laws, and compulsion. But the number of Ragged Schools, and the large number of persons who have been willing to give their time and money to Charity Schools, show that in one department at least the old virtue to which I have alluded has preserved its throne. It is perhaps in consequence of the many generations in which education has been deemed rather a merciful gift than a debt to the poor, that there are found so many eminent men always ready to instruct them without recompense. Such men as Professors Huxley, Tyndall, Carpenter, and others, could not be induced by even a large fee to leave their absorbing duties and lecture to cultivated audiences; but they continually go to lecture to assemblies of working people for nothing at all. And on such occasions they take as much pains to have their diagrams, apparatus for experiments, &c., prepared, as when they lecture for the finest audiences in their respective institutions. Recently the Rev. Septimus Haussard, the very philanthropic and energetic rector in one of the most populous parishes of London, got up a series of lectures for the poor, and he found no difficulty in procuring without money the services of the most eminent men. Mr. Norman Lockyer, the famous astronomer, is now delivering in that course a series of as excellent lectures as ever delighted the audiences of the Royal Institution. He has every week between two thousand and three thousand working men and women who listen most intently to him, and who appreciate fully his admirable experiments. I have rarely witnessed anything more impressive than the intellectual hunger and thirst of these poor people, as they listen to the unfoldings by science of the great laws by which they are surrounded. Another feature is also very impressive. Some hundred and fifty deaf and dumb persons attend these lectures. Before them stands an interpreter who translates for them every word uttered by the lecturer. This man is a genius; his hands, lips, every feature of his face—his whole form—are in motion every second of the hour and a half, and the mutes look with a singular intensity. This teacher who thus brings his pupils to these lectures is a clergyman—the Rev. Mr. Stainer—and it is all a service of the heart; he receives no payment for it whatever. When Mr. Lokey began his first lecture on the Spectrum, he was so astonished, and also touched, when he saw this orator of gesticulation before him, that for a moment he was almost unable to continue.

Matthew Arnold is travelling on the continent, having been quite unfitted for his invaluable duties as the Inspector of the higher schools, by the repeated and severe domestic afflictions he has recently suffered; namely, the death of a dearly loved sister-in-law, and also several of his children. He has now, I believe, only one son left. His friends have had recalled to them the sad circumstances surrounding the death of his brother William some years ago,—the author of Oakfield,—who was an officer in the Indian service. He went out to India with a beautiful young wife who, while he was absent on his official duties, was taken very ill. He was sent for, and the poor little lady, knowing that she must die, had her couch placed beside the window that she might get the first glimpse of him on his arrival. One day she saw a little procession of natives and soldiers hurrying to the house, with her husband at their head. It was her last earthly vision. Her eyes closed, and when in a minute more her husband was at her side, she was dead. There were three children. Mr. Arnold felt that he could not survive his wife's death. "My only hope," he wrote to his sister in London, "is that I may be able to reach England and place my children in your hands." But he died, heart-broken, on the voyage home, and the children came on alone to be received by the sister,—the wife of the Hon. W. H. Forster, member of the Cabinet, who having no children of her own adopted these. Noble children they are, the oldest boy bearing the name of Oakfield Arnold, after the hero of the father's romance. This romance abundantly shows that the intellectual superiority was well represented in the author who died so prematurely. In it he attacked some of the abuses in the Indian service; and, as it was at first published anonymously, some officers in that region hinted that the author was afraid to put his name to the work. Mr. Arnold at once published an edition with his name, and there was no further criticism. Some of the finest selections in Mrs. Charles Lowell's Seed-Grain are from Oakfield, though the book was, I believe, never printed in America. Florence Arnold, the eldest daughter of William (Dr. Arnold's third son), was "presented" at the Queen's last drawingroom, and was much admired for her intellectual type of beauty.

M. D. C.

The New York East Conference of Methodists, at their recent meeting in Harlem, admitted a large class of the brethren into "full connection." One of the disciplinary questions asked of the class was: "Will you endeavor not to speak too long or too loud?" We heartily commend that question to be asked of all candidates for the Methodist ministry. By all means let it always be insisted on.

A striking case of the iron authority of the Church and the abject superstition of its devotees has recently occurred in Kalamazoo, Mich. A Catholic layman loaned to his priest ten thousand dollars to build a church. The priest gave his notes for the amount, and subsequently died. Then the lender presented his claim to the bishop of that diocese, who denied its validity and refused payment. It was the lender's whole fortune, and he commenced suit. The bishop excommunicated him; and, when the layman went to partake of Communion, publicly spurned him from the altar with terrible anathemas. The poor man finding himself robbed, excommunicated, and anathematized by the Church, became insane with superstitious fear and remorse, and speedily died. This same unreasoning dread of the Church's authority runs through all the phases even of Protestantism, and keeps many a creed-bound man and woman from the light of truth, who would otherwise seek it if they dared.

Communications.

THE IN-BREAKING LIGHT.

The Milwaukee Sentinel, of Jan. 13, has a quite significant article in reference to a sermon recently preached in that city by a Rev. Mr. Dudley, of the Plymouth Congregational pulpit. The sermon I have not seen, but judging from the notice in this paper and the strictures that come from prominent Orthodox quarters, one may infer it was marked by a frankness, a manliness in tone, and broad freedom of treatment—such as the representative leaders and custodians in faith in that section, and indeed anywhere, are little accustomed to.

The Chicago Advance (Congregational organ) finds heresy there, and especially regrets that so essential an element in the plan of salvation as the vicarious atonement of Christ should have been omitted from the preacher's theory. The Chicago Interior (Presbyterian organ) waxes much more wroth, finds the sermon in various ways a grave offence, and, taking the attendant circumstances into the account, pregnant with results of incalculable mischief. It is "remarkable," this organ says, "first and chiefly, as having been uttered in an Orthodox Congregational Church." "Thirdly, remarkable from the impossibility of determining whether the discourse is an indictment of his own denominational beliefs or of the New Testament Scriptures," and so on. And then it proceeds to crack the ecclesiastical whip about the ears of all concerned, in the most approved ecclesiastical manner. It summons the Congregational body to take note and respond quickly to the command of duty. Let it act decisively and sharply, condemning the heresy and hurling the heretic down from his sacred office, or else it shall stand self-convicted of falseness to its own standards, be branded with cowardice or utter imbecility. "If the Congregational system cannot reach and depose such a man, it is powerless to maintain sound doctrine in its pulpit. If it can do this and does not, it is thereby condemned as false to all its Evangelical traditions and professions as a religious body. We wait with some interest to see how long such preaching will be tolerated in an Orthodox Congregational Church." A very pointed and solemn adjuration surely! We too, with the rest of mankind, will wait to see what attention the Congregationalists will pay to this case.

But the Sentinel man takes it all very quietly. He intimates that there is little danger that the Congregationalists will be forward to move in the matter. For one thing, he mentions that the rule in the Congregational body is much less despotic than in some others,—the Presbyterian, for instance. In the former, there is more scope for individual liberty; the minister in the pulpit is amenable in his utterances primarily to his own congregation, and not directly to any superior judicature. He can stay there unmolested, uncondemned, so long as they are not offended with his doctrine. But secondly, and this is of much more importance he says, the denomination will not risk the consequences that will inevitably come of any attempt to take up and dispose of such a case. There is already too much freedom of thought in the lay element of the body, too wide-spread a spirit of scepticism or renunciation of cardinal doctrines in the Orthodox faith. "The heresy complained of is not confined to the Plymouth pulpit in this city, nor to any other pulpit, but permeates the rank and file of the denomination through and through. The pew is ten times more affected by it than the desk." (The italics are ours.) "The distinctive principles of John Calvin's 'plan of salvation' [much older than John Calvin, however] are generally repudiated by the rank and file of the Congregational denomination in the West. They do not believe in the Trinity, in original sin, in the vicarious atonement, nor in the endless punishment of the wicked after death."

Such being the condition, the Sentinel surmises and doubtless rightly, that the Congregational body will do no such thing as the Interior imperiously demands. They will ignore and put up with as best they can Mr. Dudley's preaching of hated heresy; or, more likely, will attempt silently, by covert means, to throttle, to restrain, and repress it. Openly they will not dare to appear, for the venture in the present state would be too costly, and might lead to issues most to be dreaded. The ecclesiastical managers in this case, as generally, are doubtless politic and calculating, and will make discretion the better part of valor. But the admission is a pregnant one and hints much.

Everywhere we see indubitable signs that the old foundations are breaking up. The great transformations are begun, are going forward to-day with a rapidity and depth of sweep that few even of the wisest seeing among us read or know. No opposition or threats, no fulmination of anathemas will in the least check or affect the matter. The straw will not turn Niagara. The stars in their courses fight against Sisera.

Honor, all honor to the man who will stand firm and faithful to his convictions, the truth given to his soul, and speak it from his pulpit without fear or favor, knowing only fealty to the highest within him! May this Rev. Mr. Dudley—of whom I know nothing, I am sorry to say, save what the Milwaukee Sentinel reports—bear himself erect, outspoken, advancing, even though he find himself, as some have before, brought out of the fold of Orthodoxy, out of the Church, out of all churches of Christianity, and standing in the large and sun-visited domain of the free and uncontained Truth. The fields are white for the harvest; everywhere there are souls thirsting for these waters of life that shall flow from the lips touched with the divine quickening.

I think that the most effective preachers of the better faith, the ablest protestants and reformers, doing work the most searching and radically thorough, will come from the ranks of Orthodoxy, perhaps from hard, relentless Calvinism. There is a temper in this steel which makes it superior for service, a training by discipline, a directness, a stern, decisive quality, an upstandingness that you will scarcely find from the influences of the so-called liberal faiths.

Do the friends of a free and genuine religion apprehend the gravity of the responsibilities of this hour, and are they alert to meet them? There needs work, consecrated, persistent, unflinching work. The people perish for lack of knowledge, for lack of the true illumination. All over the land is saddest destitution of this means of grace. Hardly yet have a few spots even received drops of the waters of life. The spirits in prison—and they are everywhere—wait the ministrations of light which a free and catholic faith alone can give. Who of us is ready to devote himself undividedly to this service of humanity? The moment calls, and the glorious privileges of this time not long will linger.

There needs work of the finer, the affirmative cast. Criticism, not merely destructive but constructive, that deals with the facts, and works up to the high solution. Immense issues for the near and also the more distant future are wrapped up in the doings of this hour—hour indubitably appointed to be the birth-hour of the faith and worship of the coming time.

VOICES FROM THE INDEX CONSTITUENCY.

DAVENPORT, Iowa, Mar. 25, 1873.

ACT. ED. OF INDEX:

Dear Sir,—It is with great surprise and deep regret that I learn of the retirement of Mr. Abbot from the position of editor and manager of THE INDEX; and being a subscriber to THE INDEX and stock of the Association, I think it my duty to make my feelings known concerning the matter. Mr. Abbot has made THE INDEX what it is; given it influence and position, and I do not believe his place can be filled, because no man who is fitted for this place will submit to the dictation of others and allow them to prescribe his duties. As things now stand, the editor of THE INDEX is simply a tool in the hands of the Executive Committee and Board; and when such is the case it will not be made an able, independent, and influential journal. THE INDEX was started, not to make money, but to advocate the cause of religious liberty and to establish its principles upon an imperishable basis. The action of the Board of Directors was decidedly unjust, in not allowing time for all to be present; and I hope the matter will be reconsidered and Mr. Abbot recalled. I prefer to risk all that I have done and may do for THE INDEX and its cause with Mr. Abbot, than to trust its success to any Board of Directors or Executive Committee.

Yours most respectfully,
W. W. GRANT.

[We desire, in connection with the foregoing, to say that a majority of the present Executive Committee have voted not in any way to revise or restrain the editorial functions of THE INDEX so long as we remain acting editor. We could not have consented even temporarily to edit the paper under any other circumstances.—ED.]

OBERLIN, Ohio, March 21, 1873.

A. W. STEVENS:

Dear Sir,—I thank you most earnestly for your true and noble action in standing by Mr. Abbot. . . . I believe that a vast majority of the subscribers would indignantly repudiate such a shame and outrage as compelling him to retire. THE INDEX without Mr. Abbot would be a monstrosity, hideous and repugnant to every honorable friend of the paper. My experience in travelling for the paper [as agent in the employ of Mr. Butts] convinces me that the loss of Mr. Abbot would be the ruin of the paper. Even the criticisms on him, I have, on reflection, regarded as highly creditable to him.

I am, dear sir, yours sincerely,
J. E. HITCHCOCK.

THE VALUE OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Early in December last, John Ware was hanged "by the neck until dead," in Camden, N. J., for parricide. This is a description of the death scene:

Sheriff Fredericks addressed him and said: "John, can you hear what he is saying?" "Yes," was the reply. "Won't you promise me to trust in God?" "No, I'll do it!" The Lord's Prayer was then recited in unison, Ware still refusing to take part in the ceremony, but bending his eyes on the ground. He appeared affected when his jailor, an old French gentleman named Brideaux, went down on his knees and prayed for forgiveness for him; and his eyes were filled with tears when one of the gentlemen present exclaimed, "Think of your wife and child, John—oh! think of them!" But when Sheriff Fredericks asked him to repent, he shook his head moodily and said he "would not." His legs were strapped together, his last look at this earth was taken, and the black cap pulled over his eyes and secured around his neck. Sheriff Fredericks then addressed him, saying: "John, have I not done all I could for you?" and he nodded in response. "Look to Jesus, John!" An almost imperceptible shake of the head was the only reply. "Then may God bless you!" The Sheriff stepped back, there was the quick flash of a keen hatchet and the sustaining rope was severed. The weight fell with a heavy thud, and the poor wretch was jerked up into the air, the recoil being about two feet.

Here was a man, "whose breasts are distended with milk" (to use a synonym for youth that we heard Choate use in the Tirrell trial), sent straight to perdition by his fellow-men acting in the name of the law. Cui bono? Is it likely, because Ware was hung for parricide, that will prevent any other half-witted, uneducated youth, crazed with anger and passion, from snatching his father? Now, is it not about time to make a concerted attack against that relic of barbarism—capital punishment?—Exchange.

Gen. Howard's book-keeping while in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau proves no more accurate than the accounts of his associates in other departments. In other words, he is proved a defaulter in retained bounty funds alone, for $112,000. This gentleman is the great and good philanthropist so much boasted of a few years ago, and for calling whose notes in question Fernando Wood was bitterly assailed. Investigation proves worse iniquity than he was ever charged with. Like Colfax, we shall expect him to plead that he is a "Christian gentleman" as a bar to further prosecution. The money of course is gone past all hope of recovery.—St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer.

WOMEN HOLDING OFFICE IN THE CHURCH.—The recent election of two deaconesses in the Clinton Avenue (Congregational) Church of this city, and in other churches of that denomination, the female deaconates being organized by the Episcopal Churches, and some other movements recognizing the ministrations of women in the Church, the Methodist heartily endorse and says it is the restoration of an office of primitive Christianity.—Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle.

THE STATEMENT OF THE

Directors of the Index Association, concerning their controversy with the late editor has been published and a copy mailed to each of the stockholders. If not promptly received, it will be mailed on application. This statement will be mailed to any subscriber of THE INDEX on receipt of stamp to pay postage.

The undersigned has prepared a more complete and detailed statement, expelling the real cause of these troubles, which will also be sent with the above, on application, and stamp to pay postage.

MODERN THINKER--NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ere this have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all book-sellers know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give tolerance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

PAUL GOWER,

BY THE AUTHOR.

"PAUL GOWER" is a Story of English and American Life; the localization being pretty equally divided between both countries. It embraces some London, some (English) country life, much of New York Journalism, including the humorous and "Bohemian" side of it; travel from Canada to New Orleans; a midway transition, again, to Great Britain, and a return to the United States, where the story virtually concludes,—the closing scenes transpiring in the Virginian peninsula, during McClellan's unsuccessful campaign there in the second year of the late civil war. The whole narrative occurs in the five years preceding that event, incidentally involving much that led up to it, particularly secession-time in Charleston, South Carolina, the inside details of which are not in-curious.

It is, also, in the very warp and weft of it, an heterodox, rationalistic, and theological novel;

its main object being the exposure of the logical results of certain so-called religious opinions on the life and character of those who hold them. Its author has endeavored to show how these, often sincere and conscientious persons, are and must be, not only not the better, but the worse for their adherence to certain theological tenets, now obsolete with all advanced thinkers, but still dreadfully potential with the uninquiring and acquiescent on both sides of the Atlantic. He exhibits how these opinions poison the kindly springs of natural affection, pervert character, and are, in short, utterly mischievous and deplorable. This, the fulfilment of a long-cherished purpose, has not, he believes, suffered from not being obtruded, directly or otherwise, but allowed to transpire naturally in the course of a novel involving more than anti-theological objects. It is om-phatically a story, with a distinct and carefully wrought-out plot, kept in view from beginning to end.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1873, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by O. D. LITTLE, on the question, "DOES RELIGION IMPROVE A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Calka Burleigh, Horace Weaver, Alexander Loomis, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 15 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 15 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 15 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 15 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 15 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 15 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 15 copies, $1.00.

The Good Fight.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

"Fight the good fight."—PAUL.

The good fight—what is it? Paul says it is "the good fight of faith." That is one way of stating it. Another way, and perhaps a plainer and more comprehensive one, is to say it is the GOOD FIGHT OF LIFE.

For life itself is a battle, a conflict, a warfare, a discipline. Whoever takes part in life, takes part in a fight—a fight with many things, a fight for many things. Every child that is born, is born a soldier into the grand army of human activities, and has to meet and face both friends and foes, and wage a warfare that ends in glorious success or inglorious defeat. Life is a fight, and like every fight it is either a good one or a bad one. It is a good one, if we go into it with good motives, a good spirit, and inscribe on our banner a good cause. It is a bad one, if we engage in it with low aims, mean ambitions, and to accomplish some inferior ends.

In the first place, let us become fully aware that life is a battle; and let us intelligently ascertain what it is a battle with, and what it is a battle for; and so we may be inspired to take part in it with a noble purpose and to a noble end.

That life is a warfare, none can have lived it in earnest without having found out. The moment we begin to look on life with intelligent and serious vision, that moment we discover that we have arrived on the scene of grand activities and stand in the arena of magnificent opportunities. Everything around us is in motion. From the far background of the past eager ranks of contestants appear, and surge about us in the present and past us into the future. The powers of Nature mingle with the powers of humanity. The world itself, and all that it contains of mind and matter, is engaged in the strife to be and to become, to dare and to do. The forces that possess the field at once assume an attitude towards us which is either hostile or friendly; and, as they press around us in the general battle, sweep us into their ranks, suffering us not to remain an instant as neutral or inactive spectators of the fray. We find ourselves challenged straightway and drawn into the conflict, even while we contemplate it, and made to fight for the position we occupy, and for that still better one we may have desired in the distance and felt a desire to attain.

God has brought us where we cannot be idle and be great. He has put us into a position which is full of embarrassments and difficulties and perils even, until we boldly face them, and learn to cope with and overcome them. The place we hold in this world is, in the first instance, given to us by Providence; but unless we also acquire and conquer it by our own subduing energy, it is not really ours,—it is not a place in which and from which we generate and exercise power and influence. By the peculiarity of our native condition and surroundings God provokes us, if I may so say, to assert ourselves and to become conspirators with him in grand designs. In what dilemma do we find ourselves as physical beings confronting the material universe! We call this world our home, and so it is; but how did it become so? God did his part to make it so, and yet we have had to do ours. This world, noble and beautiful as it is, would never have been a comfortable and hardly a habitable home for man, if he had not put forth efforts to make it agreeable and convenient to himself. Man had to subdue the world before he could abide in it; he had to conquer the earth before he could make it his dwelling-place. Nature is the mother of man, and she loves him; but she gave him a rough treatment at first, and made him her hardy child by putting him through no tender discipline. She buffeted him with her cold, she worried him with her heat, she pursued him with hunger and thirst, she harassed him with want and deprivation, she afflicted him with pain and trouble; and so she taught man that he had no weak and doting parent to deal with, who would encourage him in idle pleasure; but rather one who would throw him on his own resources, and put him to his genuine mettle, and make him work to eat, and exercise to grow, and exert himself to live. By the sweat of thy brow thou shalt get thy bread!—this was what the dear old Earth in the beginning said to her child; and she said it not in tones of anger and in words of cursing, but in accents of love and syllables of blessing, if only we can interpret them so. "Combat for your place in my domain!" said Nature. "Earn your title and right to my possessions!" And man did combat and did earn; and it was only in this way that he acquired power over her dominions, and got the genius to discover her secrets and avail himself of her laws. And from that time to this, man's relations with Nature have been one continuous contest, one steady series of efforts and alternate defeats and successes. From that time to this she has never ceased to make demands upon his alertness, his strength, his dexterity, his cunning. Man has stepped from his original burrow in caves to his home in our modern dwellings; he has cast off the rude implements of his earliest handicraft to take up those that are the wonder of the nineteenth century; but he has achieved all this progress, he has worked up all this splendid civilization, only by a hard battle with material elements, only by fighting a good fight with natural forces which, while they have not been inimical to him, have yet not become his aids and servants until he learned to throw over them the spell and power of his growing genius. The life of man, physically and intellectually, has been a warfare. The house he lives in, the clothing he wears, the food he eats, the vehicles that transport his body and his thought,—all these are the spoils he has brought back from his conquests over Nature.

And his intellectual triumphs, which have been not less, have been won at the same great cost of effort. Man has gained no amount of knowledge, he has acquired not a foot of territory in the realm of truth, which he has not had to battle for in a most vigorous and manful fashion. Plato, with his vast accumulation of ideas—Goethe, with his eighty odd years of literary culture—Humboldt, with his ninety odd of scientific lore—Agnassiz, with his magnificent fund of zoological information,—all these did not fill their capacious intellectual urns from some free and open profusion of wisdom's stores; but each delved for his treasures in the quarries of truth, and went forward into the domain of science as the conquering hero goes, subduing by might of mental shew the territories he took possession of.

But morally and spiritually, also, the life of man has ever been a conflict. Ask the heroes of virtue and the saints of goodness, if this be not so. Ah, yes! Listen to what they say! Socrates calmly speaks to us from the cell where he drank the poison hemlock, warning us that philosophic virtue and wisdom get no sympathy from the crowd. Jesus cries to us from under the cross that bears him down, telling us there is no ascending the mountains of holiness except by the way of the mounts of Calvary. Paul lifts up his voice in echo, saying that he wrestles with the principalities and powers of evil, and combats with the law of sin that warreth in his members. Augustine prolongs the testimony, confessing of the toughness of the conflict which so often ensues between the spirit and the flesh. But we need not go so far back as any of these for proof that there is a fight to be fought in the arena of the soul. Our own personal and private experience will each day assure us of this. There is no personal devil to fight with, as Augustine and Paul and Jesus believed; but there are the lower propensities, desires, appetites, and passions of our nature to be dealt with,—not to be crucified, but to be disciplined, trained, and controlled by reason; these offer to us no slight and no infrequent conflict. We are face to face and hand to hand with them every day. They dog our steps, hang upon our flanks, and spring at us from many a covert as we pass along our accustomed way. Our whole path through life is ambushed by them, and we have them to confront at frequent unexpected crises. Sometimes one of the most powerful of them will spring upon us and drag us to the very brink of some awful depth, so that we can look into the horrible darkness of a possible degradation; and we have to summon all the divine within us, and call upon all the Divine above us, to enable us to cast off the might of this terrible power and hold ourselves back from precipitation to gulfs of sin and sorrow frightful to think of. But oftener they come in a less formidable and violent manner; skirmishing only with our unwary thoughts, parleying with our innocent intentions, or even mingling under show of truce with our better desires and higher motives. Yet even then the warfare has not ceased, the position of the unfriendly forces has not been vacated; and unless our sentinels are out, our picket line well guarded, one of these higher motives, these better desires, is suddenly captured, and we are led to say and do and be that which is all unworthy of our manhood and our womanhood. So that the battle for moral victory and spiritual success is hardly suspended at all with any of us. If a temporary lull occurs, and we indulge ourselves in rest, the need always is that we sleep upon our arms and be ready at any moment to renew the fight.

Yes; on every hand, and in every respect, life is a battle-field for us. God has turned us loose into this great arena of the world. Opposed to us are mighty powers, though on our side are powers more mighty still. There are no prizes given that are not contended for. Some may seem to be holding desirable things which they have not earned; but where this is the case,—where any one has possessions which his genuine merits do not entitle him to have,—most surely sooner or later they will escape him; they will perish in his very grasp and leave no true enriching behind, but only greatest loss and poverty. We enjoy no fruits of victory we do not somehow help to win and perpetuate. Life is a battle for all, and not for a few only. The field is large, and the service is various; but in some one part or another all are called to engage. Who is sorry that this is so? Who is sorry that work and toil and pains are the coin we have to pay for whatever is truly desirable? Who is not glad rather to be one of the great company who fight and win, who endure and triumph, who suffer and are strong? None but cowards will refuse to take part in a good warfare; none but traitors will fly from the field of a good cause. They who are sturdy in their mental and moral constitution, who desire to be intellectual and spiritual athletes, will welcome whatever fight may be inevitable and necessary, and will stand valiantly on the battle-field of life, contending for its best and noblest prizes.

Do some say ease is good, and quiet is good, and plenty is good? Aye, indeed, if they are well earned; but, under all circumstances, wisdom and virtue, manhood and womanhood, are infinitely better. We are so made and so conditioned in this life, that we cannot have the best and highest things without strenuously contending for them. What is that best and highest thing which any man or woman can have? Is it not character? Character which is built of the finest and noblest material—self-respect, self-reliance, energy, earnestness, purity, reverence. I tell you there is nothing, on earth or in heaven, so great or desirable as this. But this we cannot possess, cannot acquire, except we figuratively go through fire and water for it, through tears and blood, through earth and hell. The original of the word "fight," as used by Paul, signifies to agonize, or to exert oneself in the most strenuous, earnest, mighty, and even painful manner. This is the point—that in order to secure the highest and best we must agonize for it. As we hew out our noblest edifices from the quarry and the forest, so we must hew out that noblest edi-flue of all—CHARACTER—from the hard and flinty rock of circumstance, from the intricate jumble and mass of opposing difficulties, from poverty, hardship, toil, pain, trouble.

Shall we, if we are or would be great, desire exemption from any needful discipline, from any hard or inevitable warfare, which, if we are faithful in it, shall bring us through to triumph and to fullness of joy? No! for this battle of life is a most rewarding toil, say what we will in disparagement of it when its burdens rest heaviest on our hearts. It brings us the grandest results, present and prospective. We greater in every hour of its conflict, when we stand steady and valiant and true. The chivalry of this common daily life,—let it not be despised; for it much ennobles us as we bear ourselves knightly and well through all the fray, keeping the point of our lance firmly set against every false and ignoble thing. How many good fights there are to be fought!—The fight for Liberty, of body and mind; the fight for Truth, which itself makes free; the fight for Wisdom, that enlightens the intellect and heart; the fight for Justice, that levels up all to the plane of brotherhood; the fight for Virtue, that makes heroes and heroines of us all. Grand contentions these! Oh, let me not be counted out from them; let not any of us be counted out! (Give us the armor requisite, that we may put it on; place in our hands the colors, that shall wave in brightness over our heads; reach hither the gleaming weapons, against which no foe shall stand! Then sound in our expectant ears the note of charge, and we will move on to victory and to glory!)

NOAH'S REAL NAME.—It is said that the Chinese declare that Noah's real name was Ah Boo, and that he resided in Pekin. Unfortunately Noah's family-Bible was lost in the flood, and we cannot ascertain from it exactly what his name was. His door-plate also seems to be missing, and he had a very careless way of neglecting to mark his shirts; so we are baffled in that direction. We have inquired at the libraries for a copy of the Pekin directory of that date, to see if Noah really figured in its pages; the only copy any of them had was out. For our part, we do not believe that his name was Ah Boo, or that he resided in Pekin. These Chinamen really claim everything that is going, from gunpowder up to newspapers. If we give them any ground in the Noah business, the first thing we know they will be out with the assertion that the ark was insured in the Pekin Mutual Company, and that Noah used to give the Pekin newspaper people free tickets to go in and see the animals perform. The interests of Christianity require that we should believe the Bible.—Sunday Dispatch.

"Barb," of the Watchman and Reflector, relates the following incident at the Fulton-street Prayer meeting:—

"After singing a verse, a young brother, with a smooth face, sharp, black eye, and an abundance of black hair artistically curled, arose and said he was amazed that somebody stated in yesterday's Witness that the Water-street Mission, with which he is connected, wanted money. In a sharp, steel-trappy style, he repudiated the unworthy suspicion; for, if the Mission did need money, nobody knew it but God. They had, indeed, often come to the last of their resources, but told nobody but God; and they had always had enough supplied. It was God's work, and God was responsible for it. Fifty ate at their table yesterday. Their day dinners and their midnight suppers were accomplishing a great deal. He felt it his duty to say this much. And, having advertised the Water-street Mission, the brother took his seat, and kept a sharp watch on every one who spoke or prayed during the meeting.

The Boston Courier remarks as follows on the late discussion in New York over the necessity of brimstone preaching:—

The early purity and strength of Methodism is apparently disappearing, and this degeneration seriously alarms the "good old Bowery school of theologians," who are casting about for some sure and speedy remedy. At a late meeting of the ministers of this denomination in New York, one Mr. Corbett, in discussing the causes of spiritual decay among the rank and file, electrified his brethren by solemnly announcing as "the reason why we do not get along faster, is because we do not have hell enough in our religion." This was a little too strong for his audience, and they rather turned the cold shoulder to Brother Corbett; but that gentleman is still firm in the belief that the only road to salvation lies in a return to the tactics of those days when preachers were wont to entitle their sermons, "A Few Groans from Hell," and "A Nut for Damned Sinners to Crack."

E. H. Lepper, of Cambridge, a scholar of Rev. George H. Hepworth, and a member of the Radical Club, has written a book named "Oratone Buzz." It is a satire upon schools of thought of all colors. The Radicals fall asleep, he says, not in the bosom of Jesus, but in the bosom of Mr. Emerson.—St. Louis Globe.

PAUL GOWER.

OF

CHAPTER XVII.

As the reader is aware, Paul's articles had expired on his attaining his majority; and he did not return to Mr. Bligh's office for the few months during which it was determined that he should remain in England. The architect seldom cared to retain his pupils when their time was out, on a salary; though they were welcome to stay as long as they pleased without. He always had enough young gentlemen in that capacity to enable him to carry on the business, with the addition of a couple of clerks. Some of these learned their profession pretty thoroughly, others indifferently, others not at all; Paul ranking among the second and most numerous class. As has been previously remarked, he had no particular liking for or aptitude towards it, and therefore had only acquired that part which is least practical. He could make a good water-color drawing, or "perspective," or "elevation," but was woefully ignorant of working details; inasmuch that perhaps it was lucky for him that his father's invitation had arrived just in time to relieve him from the responsibility of obtaining a livelihood by the practice of architecture—which, indeed, very few of Mr. Bligh's pupils succeeded in doing. And, in this connection, it may be worth while remarking how many ex-young Englishmen there are who have started in life in the same vocation, to subsequently develop into artists, actors, journalists, and what not. I am unaware whether the offices of the profession teem with pupils now-a-days, as they did fifteen or twenty years ago; but unquestionably Mr. Pecksniff was then a fact and a flourishing one.

Mr. Bligh generally cut his young gentlemen adrift with the greatest civility and a complimentary character; after which, if they did not get on, it was certainly not his fault. He was, as has been already stated, a man of the world, who believed in avoiding everything disagreeable: when he found it necessary to scold his pupils, he did it by letter, always writing short, severe, but very polite notes, the contents of which were sure to rankle for sometime in the mind of the recipient; the more so because they allowed no opening for reply. Very often, too, the architect reprimanded offenders through the singular medium of an ancient sister, who lived on the premises, and was supposed to spend no small portion of her leisure in watching the doings of the clerks and pupils from the back windows. Thus they would be informed, epistolarily, in the third person, that Miss Bligh objected to the too frequent appearance of the pot-boy of an adjacent public-house in the office; to his presence in the kitchen; to Mr. Grayling's kissing his hand and throwing cocked-hat notes to the servant girls in the neighboring court (which proceedings ultimately resulted in the fastening-down of the lower-sash of the casement looking in that direction, and the obscuring of its panes with white paint), and so on. In short, her brother used the poor old maid as a stalking-horse; or as Mr. Spenslow did the name of his partner in David Copperfield. In all his dealings with his pupils he was so shrewd that there was but one solitary instance on record of his having been got the better of. This was in the case of Bowker, who, articulated by a city-company for the usual term of five years, learned his business in three; and then, availing himself of the breach of certain indefinite promises of pecuniary emolument by Mr. Bligh, did so improve that grievance that he constrained his employer to assent to the cancelling of his indentures; and, when he would have disparaged his pupil's industry and abilities, put him to confusion by the production of a highly-eulogistic letter, previously written to the young man by the architect himself. But Bowker was always sure to make his way in the world, and at present owns a quarter of a mile or so of houses in the west end of London.

Paul, then, was not wanted in Soho Square, even if he had wished to stay there. Mr. Bligh shook hands with him cordially at parting, asked him two or three questions about America, without waiting for an answer, and talked business with Mr. Coulon during the farewell interview, which lasted five minutes. His fellow-pupils gave him a vaudeville banquet of beef-steak and onions, ordered from the public-house, and eaten in the office, Mr. Bligh being out of the way, and Mr. Coulon consenting to take the chair; when the senior clerk unlaid, even to singing the part of Arioxomines, in an extemporaneous performance of the first scene in Bombastes Furioso,—being entertained upon the table, with Paul and Grayling standing on each side below, as first and second courtiers. These revels ended, Paul definitely quitted a place of which he had only pleasant recollections. He was his own master, with the prospect of nothing to do for three months; a delay which might have become rather irksome but for his newly-kindled hopes of a reconciliation with Kate. These, and the desire of the company of her brother and Harry Franklin in crossing the Atlantic, more than resigned him to his involuntary holiday.

It was tacitly understood between himself and his grandparents that he intended to make the voyage in conjunction with the friends aforesaid; to which arrangement they offered no objection, though Mrs. Gower's opinion of Richard Sabin had not undergone any improvement—indeed she disliked him worse than ever, in consequence of what she denominated his insolence, on the occasion of their meeting after the catastrophe at Newman Street. Still, with Paul's complete emancipation so near at hand, it would have been superfluous to quarrel with an intimacy which she would soon possess no means of controlling; and which was not unlikely to terminate altogether at New York,—Richard designing to stay there, while Paul went on to New Orleans. To young Franklin (of whom the old lady and gentleman had heard from Ruth and Mr. Blencowe) there could be no objection.

Of the project of going in a sailing-vessel—to which Sabin soon won Paul's consent, and which he propounded, not as emanating from his friend—Mr. and Mrs. Gower rather approved than otherwise, under the impression that it was much safer than in a steamer; and thinking also that the young man could not begin the world better than by roughing it a little as a stowage-passenger. It would save his father's money, the old lady remarked, which he was bound to take care of. So everything being settled, there remained nothing for him to do but await the 1st of March with as much patience as possible.

His condition at home had, for the present, materially improved. He was judiciously let alone for the first time in his life, and permitted to come and go very much at his own pleasure; abusing his liberty by the perpetration of no special atrocities. Being under little temptation to stay out of nights, now that No. —, in Newman Street, was closed to him, he seldom transgressed the eleven o'clock ordinance, or afforded other cause for complaint or reprobation. Perhaps the old lady would have preferred it if he had; scolding had become a kind of necessity to her, and it cost some self-denial to forego that indulgence. Besides Paul was so serious and silent that she could not help attributing his changed demeanor to some revulsion of feeling, originating in resentment of the interference of herself and her husband with his private affairs; and desiring to justify herself—after her fashion. But she found no suitable opportunity for more than a few general remarks, to the effect that however young people might be disposed to regard the exercise of authority in their present immature state, the time would assuredly come when they would acknowledge that those who were older and wiser than themselves had always acted for the best, and be proportionally thankful. To which Paul returned no answer. His approaching departure really softened his heart towards his aged relatives, and its consequences, was too vivid and humilitating to admit of such overtures to reconciliation. But for that, there would have been unwonted accord and harmony in the house near the Hampstead Road.

Paul spent a great deal of his time in the library of the British Museum, to which Mr. Blencowe had procured him admission some years ago, and where his reading was exceedingly desultory (being undertaken with no higher object than amusement), but not without its uses afterwards; also he haunted the studios of Dick Sabin and Mr. Humphries, and others of his acquaintance. The two artists of Great James Street led much the same lives as ever; though Richard made occasional spasmodic attempts at reformation, which always broke down after two or three days industry. He consoled himself with laying down fresh squares of Tartarean pavement. "I am going," he said, "to turn over a new leaf when we get to New York, and to sink all my bad habits in the Atlantic." And then, as the credit of future good intentions, he would throw up his task for the time being, and propose a visit to some place of entertainment, Paul, nothing loth, accompanying him. Once he gave his friend ten pounds to keep for him, because he couldn't; but asked for and spent it two days afterwards. Ultimately, indeed, he was obliged to borrow the money for his passage from Harry Franklin, subsequently remitting it to him in Canada.

After the conversation already related, Richard seldom mentioned his sister, except incidentally; as when Paul asked him how the fam-ity in Newman Street were affected by his prospective emigration.

"They take it easy," he remarked—"all of them. The governor hasn't said a word about it since he went to Sam's—which he wouldn't have thought of, if my mother hadn't put him up to it. I don't believe he ever troubles his head about me, except when I run against him, which isn't very often. She—no! the mothers are always all right; I must except her—only I wish her affection would take some other form than exhorting me to propitiate Providence by a steady go-in at Little Bethel and the Reverend (Alvin Burnaby, or some such person. Then, she says, I shall be sure to prosper; but I don't understand bribing the higher powers by any such means. The girls gush and ask questions; but it's all blatherskite and gammon and spinnach. Kate was kind enough to offer me a lot of tracts and to talk like a missionary addressing a particularly unregenerate heathen—which is always pleasant, you know, especially from a sister. I don't think she's a bit the better for her slump over into what she calls religion; and so I told her. And I'm sure the house is ever so much more disagreeable."

By such exceptional confidences Sabin doubtless intended to throw cold water on his friend's passion. His objections to it had been quite honestly stated: he distrusted both Kate's disposition and Paul's constancy; regarding the latter as an excellent fellow, but a very young man, the fervor of whose feelings militated against their permanence—in which opinion, perhaps, Richard exhibited judgment. At the same time he might, and probably would, have been perfectly ready to plight himself to unlimited fidelity to any young woman—say Ruth Gower—whom he fancied himself in love with; if he had obtained an opportunity, and if she had smiled upon his addresses.

In addition to these discouragements, Kate went into the country without answering Paul's letter, as he learned from Mills. There were reasons, she told the poor drawing-master, why she didn't, why she couldn't, send a reply. Between her lover and herself there was a great gulf, which she did not expect could be bridged over—which she did not care to specify. It was better for both parties that they should not meet again. Hurt and disappointed, and more than suspecting the cause of his mistress's behavior (of which we shall hear enough in due time), Paul wrote to his friend, Harry Franklin, relating what had happened, and entreating him to use what opportunities lay in his power to ascertain the state of Kate's mind towards him. Also he enclosed a poem on their approaching departure, for the Guardian; in which he stated that he was "His home and country leaving, right soon should he be gone, Through the foamy brine fast cleaving, the sun's track following on;" and further intimated that "That many a sun would set and rise, ere he again might stand, In the country of his home and heart, his own dear native land;" with other information equally sentimental and superfluous—which, of course, he never expected would be read by Kate Sabin. Having despatched which compositions, he waited for an answer with some interest and anxiety.

About this time, too, firing of his idleness and learning from a friend, who belonged to an architect's association, that a Mr. Dornon, of Hanover Street, wanted a draughtsman for a month or so, Paul applied there and was engaged at a salary of thirty shillings a week; to do little more than occupy a small office, looking on the street, from nine in the morning till six in the evening, and to remit letters and messages by post to his new employer, when he was out of town. He was an old bachelor, who possessed a private independence and some practice, chiefly afforded by a Leicestershire baronet, which necessitated his almost constant absence in that county. When in London, he required Paul's attendance in his own room, a large, back one, lighted from above, and ornamented with framed architectural drawings and plaster-of-paris reliefs; where he sat opposite his chief, working according to his instructions, and at first finding it rather difficult to avoid laughing at his habits, of which he had contracted a great many, in consequence of living alone. Thus he not only talked to himself, every now and then coming out, in quite a startling manner, with some sentence he had uttered a quarter of an hour before, having kept silent during the interval; but was accustomed to express his approval or disapprobation of Paul's drawing or suggestions in a sort of iterative soliloquy, dwelling on the syllables in a kind of droning chant—as, "ver—y good, Mr. Gower! ver—y good! ver—y good, indeed! Make it so! make it so! make it so, by all means!" or, "Ne—er do! ne—er do! ne—er do at all!" and so on. But they got on very well together in the long run.

A whip is no insignificant agent in dispersing a crowd; but a nervous woman making through a crowd for the cars with a valise in one hand and an umbrella in the other, is about as appalling an object as the human mind can conceive and maintain its balance.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

SINCERELY DO I REGRET if my brief reference to Mrs. Dall's lectures was not sufficiently discriminating to do her all justice. In reserving to myself the right of a slight criticism, I at the same time certainly held a very high regard both for her motive and her abilities. But she reminds me that she carefully avoided using any personal remarks in her lectures, and so my saying that she was "a little too severe in her speech upon some of the later reformers," was unjust. And I see now that my words were not so explicit as they should have been. True, Mrs. Dall did not mention names, but some of her pointed sentences suggested names to me, as I supposed they did to others; and a few of her statements I felt assured were not in accordance with facts. For instance, if my memory be not wholly at fault, she spoke of "free love" as being the "modern name for prostitution." Few people, perhaps, would take exception to that. But I for one do not believe that those who are now so prominently advocating "free love" have stored in their minds and hearts more of a desire to advocate "prostitution" than has Mrs. Dall herself; and that certainly is saying all in their behalf one need to say. I see no good reason why Mrs. Woodhull may not advocate what she calls "free love," and yet receive from all intelligent, good, and straightforward people,—and especially from people who have had no little experience in battling for obnoxious ideas which they deemed true and saving,—social recognition and respect. Suppose Mrs. Woodhull should visit our Second Radical Club. Should our fearless reformers gather their skirts about them, button up their overcoats, and depart? I don't believe so foolish a spectacle would be witnessed. On the contrary, even the most timid would soon summon courage to ask, "What do you mean?" And if they found her evidently zealous for the welfare of the race, though advocating social changes which they regarded as wholly unwise, I think they simply would say, "We differ;" just as they have often done among themselves on questions of exciting interest before. But, let who would fly the room, I venture to say that Mrs. Dall would not be of the number. She would stand her ground, listen and reply, and then go away (I venture again to believe) in full faith that in a country where there are virtually no questions sealed and under governmental ban, but where all questions are ever open, to be reconsidered whenever any one shows cause,—no evil, but increasing good must surely follow the wake of free discussion. Why not, then, cease our moral fluttering whenever a strange idea is launched, withhold our impeachment of motive or character either direct or implied, and quietly act and talk as though we had some sense ourselves, and doubted not but the public generally had, or at least would acquire a quantity sufficient for final salvation? I know, indeed, that even Boston "radicalism" has a touch of the cowardly in its nature; but not enough, I trust, to over-awe and prevent the free expression of its real self.

ONE CAN NOT ESCAPE POLITICS more than the small pox, when the only descriptive word is "miserable." Things may be worse in Spain, but the real fact about Spain or France may not lie on the surface as here. There is revolution, and things are in process of formation. Here we have a humdrum, settled state of affairs, and are trying to persuade ourselves that it is all very good. We have our Republican party without ideas or inspiration, bankrupt in head and heart, sunk in corruption, living on intrigue and cant. Yet still we hear of the glories of the past, and are overwhelmed with promises for the future. What of the present? This party believes every promise it makes; it has neither insight nor courage for to-day's use. If it has neither moral sentiment nor enthusiasm for the demands of to-day, what business has it to talk of the morrow? I will venture a prediction. Before Grant's term expires, a new party will be in power in Massachusetts, and Grant will be the last Republican president. On every hand I hear: "Well, this kind of thing has gone about far enough; it's time for a change." And the change is surely coming.

UP AT OUR STATE-HOUSE we have a debating club, and a very ordinary one at that. There are plenty of boys out West, who will crowd their club-room of an evening and discuss affairs of State in a manner to put our Bay-State statesmen (as represented by the last and the present legislature) to shame. I have listened this winter to debates on the Woman Question, and the Sumner resolutions; and know whereof I speak.

The woman debate was simply silly; counting out one or two speeches, it would, if published, astonish and convulse the world. The great party of progress went back on its own recorded promise of the last campaign. But what folly is it for these representatives to debate eight or ten days every year whether they shall submit a proposition to the people for their vote! Why not let the people vote at once? Let the people have a chance to give the subject "respectful consideration." But the people choose their representatives? They do, and they don't. The politicians manage the thing mostly. Once in power, and under the wing of the prestige of a past victory, only a revolution unseats them. But such a revolution is in the breeze just now, and not likely to die away without result.

MANY DAYS WERE DEVOTED by our legislature to the Sumner resolution. The last legislature censured him for his proposal about the battle-flags of the national army. Could this resolution be expunged? By a very large vote, given by angry Republicans, the foolish record of the last legislature was declared to be sacred in the name of patriotism! Some one, whose heart is big enough to enshrine the world, speaks of "stupid patriotism." And surely, if patriotism can make no better show than this, which would forever flaunt in the eyes of a fallen foe—a foe that is to be no longer, but equal brother and citizen—the remembrance of the old feud inscribed upon the very flag under which they are expected to march and fight together for a common country's defence and glory, then indeed is it not only "stupid," but damnable. Gratitude to our dead soldiers? If we have no better way to show our gratitude than to divide forever the country they fought to unite, by this display of "hatred of treason and of traitors," far better that we should have done with gratitude, as being something not at all akin with civilization and decent humanity. If we are never to have union and peace, no more now after the war than before, what a crime was that war!

OUR OLD TIME FAST DAY came off on Thursday last. Little fasting, but a season for sports and games. The thin churches eked out a dreary sort of performance, because the Governor requested it. "A day of fasting and prayer," said he. The other word, "humiliation," conveyed too much irony by far, and he skipped it. Freeman Clarke redeemed the occasion by most timely remarks, and set "Fast Day" down as an occasion out of date. Dr. Bartol was even more emphatic, and gave, in his own unerring fashion, a running fire against the insincere custom. One always wishes that every such good, wholesome, emphatic word could be published. But, alas! the age is very slow as well as very fast.

"NEW YORK CITY, sitting in darkness, depending on a money-making monopoly," quoth a morning paper. Very good! "Money-making monopoly" hits the mark. Let the lesson have universal application.

GOOD CHIEF.

LIFT up thy voice all valiantly,
O prospering Cause of Truth
Whate'er betide our "ways and means,"
Toward thee the Age a-listening leans, Thine is the voice of prophecy,
And thine the heart of youth!

A. F. MACOMBER, Executive Committee
F. E. ABBOT, of the Index Association.

A mass meeting of the Spiritualists of America has been called at Cincinnati, for May 23.

The Investigator says that Dr. Bartol preached lately "in favor of abrogating the Sunday laws, on the ground that they are antediluvian, unchristian, and unjust."

O. A. Bronson says that "Methodism is a compound of sentimentalism and animalism." That is a very pungent remark, but not altogether true. Will this famous Catholic now tell us what Catholicism is?

Several correspondents in the Church Journal complain that the Episcopal Church has too many ministers—more than are useful. Without doubt. But is not that a fault of all the Churches? Apparently, the more ministers the less religion.

O. A. Bronson says that the "Reformation of the sixteenth century was an apostasy from Christ." True; but instead of being, as he says further, "in principle, a return to pure heathenism," it was a return to pure rationalism,—which our Unitarian brethren do not perceive.

Mr. H. L. Green, of Syracuse, N. Y., formerly agent of THE INDEX, has been having a lively controversy with some of the Orthodox clergymen of that city, in the daily Standard, concerning certain Orthodox doctrines; in which he appears to have had much the better of the argument.

We have received quite a number of letters from friends of THE INDEX cordially endorsing Mr. Morse's suggestion, that "THE INDEX be transferred, body and soul, back to Mr. Abbot;" and pledging amounts of money, more or less, to carry out the idea. At the proper time these can be made public.

Let it be remembered that the aggregate value of ecclesiastical property in this country paying nothing towards the support of the government is computed at over three hundred and thirty millions of dollars. Every tax-paying citizen is indirectly compelled to help support and increase this church-moneyed monopoly. Is not Liberalism justified in demanding its abolition?

Rev. Mr. Hammond, the great revivalist, said, in a sermon recently delivered in Denver, Colorado, that he "had noticed that great revivals are always followed by instances of sudden death." This is a frank but unwittingly fatal admission. It is, indeed, true that "revivals" have a most pernicious effect upon the sanitary condition of both body and mind.

Among the "contingent expenses" of Congress is a large item every year for "spittoons;" another for "combs and brushes;" still another reads thus wittily: "One dozen French snuff, for use of Senate, $1.20." When God, and Jesus Christ, and the Bible, are put into the Constitution, we shall expect to see these immoral "contingents" abated.

Many Orthodox Christians are very much exercised just now to have discovered that the public secular press of this country is almost exclusively in the hands of rationalists or liberals. This is very naturally so. The strong breeze of intelligence that blows through the daily press sweeps before it the fog of Orthodox absurdities. Common sense is always a good antidote against doctrinal Christianity.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

We very gladly give place, at request, to the following invitation of the Free Religious Association to all friends of the cause to meet with them in a Social Donation Festival which they propose to hold in Boston during the week of the "May Meetings." We trust it will be largely responded to, and that one of the results of the Festival will be the replenition of the treasury of the Association, which has never suffered from plethora, and which, should it be furnished with ample means, would enable the Association to serve the good cause with so much greater efficiency. If any of our Western friends are proposing to go East this summer, let them anticipate the time if possible, and put in an appearance at this Festival, as well also at the Annual Meeting of the Association, which will immediately precede it. On this occasion, let Boston be our modern Jerusalem, unto which all of the house of religious freedom shall go, willing to be taxed and sure to receive a blessing. Our own "mouth waters" at the thought of the "feast of fat things" which will then be given to the faithful and the fortunate. Absent in body, we shall be present in spirit; and we send the most cordial benediction of THE INDEX to the friends then and there to be assembled, of whom we trust our friend Mr. Abbot will be one.

The Free Religious Association invite their friends to unite with them in a Social Donation Festival, to take place in Horticultural Hall, Boston, on the evening of Friday, May 30, 1873.

The object of this meeting is to strengthen the Association by closer ties of sympathy and union between all those who accept the idea of Religious Freedom, to promote that "Fellowship of the Spirit" which is one of the objects named in its constitution, and to increase its pecuniary resources.

The records of the Society having been destroyed by the disastrous fire in Boston, it is desired to renew and increase its membership at this time. It is also important to its extended usefulness that its treasury should be replenished.

The time will be devoted to social conversation, music, and short speeches. Refreshments will be for sale from 6 P. M. till 10. Music and speaking will begin at 7 1/2. All persons, of every name, sect, or party, who sympathize with the spirit of the Free Religious Association, are invited to unite with us on this occasion. This invitation, endorsed by the names of those using it, will be a sufficient pass to the Festival, and those desiring invitations for themselves or friends can obtain them by application to any one of the Committee.

Subscriptions or donations for the Association will be received at tables arranged for the purpose in the hall, or may be sent by letter to the Treasurer, Richard P. Hallowell, 89 Commercial Street, Boston. The Committee will be happy to receive supplies for the refreshment tables, and also flowers, at the hall, on the morning of the Festival.

OFFICERS OF THE F. R. ASSOCIATION.

Curtis, Frederick Schuneman-Pott, Edward L. Youmans, E. B. Ward, George Hoadly, Thomas Westworth Higginson. Secretary,—William J. Potter. Assistant Secretary,—Hannah E. Stevenson. Treasurer,—Richard P. Hallowell. Directors,—John Weiss, Charles K. Whipple, Ednah D. Cheney, John T. Sargent, Mary C. Shannon, Francis E. Abbot.

A PROTEST.

As one of the Directors of the Index Association, I wish publicly to record my most earnest and emphatic protest against the action of the Directors at the meeting of March 13, which led to the resignation of Mr. Abbot as editor. I must protest against it, not only as subjecting the editor of THE INDEX to a control from which he was always understood to be free, but as a violation of good faith, on the part of the Directors who were present and favored that action, towards those who were absent. Previously, and on less important matters, the Directors had been notified, a month or two beforehand, of special business that was to be considered; and the Directors who resided away from Toledo rested in the assurance that nothing of grave import to the paper would be attempted without giving them a chance to be present to vote upon the proposition, or at least to express their opinion upon it by letter. But this action of the 13th of March, though involving consequences so momentous, was taken without any previous notice whatever. The other absent Directors, doubtless, hold the same opinion of it as I do, or may have already expressed their opinion, whatever it be; but at this distant point I cannot wait for the opportunity of consulting and acting with them before making my protest.

MAGNOLIA, FLORIDA, April 7, 1873.

SIGNS OF DECADENCE.

The Unitarians, when twitted on account of the smallness of their sect, are wont to say that their influence is shown in the modification of the popular theology; the more correct statement being that the modification of the popular theology is shown in them. They are a sign of theological decay, not a cause of it. In the same way, every rationalist or free religious society is a proof of decadence of a more radical decomposition. The congregation in New York—to take that as an example—is composed largely of people who were formerly associated with the Orthodox sects; some were Episcopallians, some Presbyterians, and some, even, Roman Catholics. Extremes meet there without jarring. The avowed atheist sits by the side of the aforetime believer in Trinity; the professed materialist dreads no contagion from the quondam expectant of irresistible grace from the Holy Ghost. And the remarkable circumstance is, that several of these attendants on services that pay the feeblest tribute to Christianity as a specific form of religion never formally abandoned their old faith, were never converted or perverted, never were malcontents, protesters, or doubters; had no wandering desires towards heresy, but rather dreaded it; kept away from association with it, and ventured into its neighborhood timidly and with reluctance. They came at the urgent request, perhaps, of a friend, or out of an impulse of curiosity; and they stayed because they were interested.

Still more remarkable is it that these persons experience no shock in passing from one of these extremes of opinion to the opposite; they go through no anguish of mind; they are sensible of no wrench of feeling, but take their places and partake of their strange food with a freshness of appetite, and a heartiness of digestion, which are not usual with people afflicted with mental distress. The agonies suffered by the doubters of the last generation are unknown to these latest come-outers, who tear themselves away from their birthright connections without a pang, and hardly express surprise, scarcely at all a disagreeable surprise, at the objects that greet them in the circle of their new acquaintances.

More noteworthy yet is it that the kindred and friends of these erratic believers take their vagaries with tolerable composure. Of course there is remonstrance in particular cases, and earnest opposition, but rather on social than on theological or even spiritual grounds. Radicalism is not respectable, and conservatism is. The fashion is all in the Orthodox churches. The nobodies are radicals. But when it is discovered that the free religious men and women are decent, civil, reputable, gentlemanly, and ladylike, inferior to none in intelligence, culture, or refinement, the opposition diminishes. The "Evangelical" husband hires a sitting for his wife in heretic hall; the wife, an ardent churchwoman, sees without a sigh her spouse take his departure, on Sunday morning, for the place where another gospel is dispensed to another class of minds. Fragments are suffered to split off from families, and are allowed—yes, sometimes encouraged—to revolve round centres in very different systems; and it never could be suspected, from the look on the parental countenance, that the erring son or daughter was in danger of becoming fatally erratic, and flying off into the awful insane.

All this implies a radical disintegration of the old systems, a loss of the cohesive force that held their particles together, and a decay of the links of association that bound them closely up with human minds. Call the mood one of indifference, if you will. Indifference is disbelief, and disbelief of the most hopeless kind, because moral. The bitterest enemies of the popular theology ask nothing but indifference to it. They are willing to let belief in opinions of another kind go. They will give up proselytizing, which is adopted in most cases as an expedient for breaking down faith in the old dogma, rather than of begetting faith in the new; and will disband cheerfully their organizations, if their end can be attained without them. THE INDEX would be deprived of its chief ground of being, if a sudden indifference to the "Christian system" were to fall upon the popular mind. Its work would be, in one aspect, ended.

"Anything rather than indifference!" is a common cry. "Give us any faith rather than none!" We do not echo it; but exclaim in a very different tone: "No faith at all, rather than some that men profess to have." Is it not possible that a state of indifference may be a needful preliminary to a new and vigorous departure? Whether it be or no, the indifference is rapidly coming upon us. All the arts of architecture, decoration, and music are exerted, with only partial success, to arrest it. The theological spirit has died out. The ecclesiastical spirit is identical with indifference of a certain sort. The fashionable spirit is identical with indifference of the worst sort. The cause, or one cause, of the fewness and feebleness of radical societies—for they are both feeble and few—is not the interest in the old theology, which keeps people away from them, but an indifference to all theology, which carries people past them, and prevents their joining any religious society whatever.

SCRAPS OF CORRESPONDENCE.

For the encouragement of the radicals who believe that Liberalism has indeed just "demands" to make, and that they ought to be urged with a determination tempered only by fairness and kindness of spirit, I wish to make a few desultory notes gathered from recent correspondence.

Mr. E. S. Beckley reports a new Liberal League as organized in Monticello, Iowa; the list of officers being given on the first page. He adds: "Your subscribers here feel a disappointment in the backset THE INDEX has taken. . . . Our sympathies are with the editors."

Mr. W. H. Crowell, President of the Liberal League in Jefferson, Ohio, writes hopefully of the work now doing, and is glad to "fall in with and assist the churches in their opposition" to the Christian Amendment. "The heaven is working," he says, "and North-Eastern Ohio is not asleep over this movement to unite Church and State." Leagues have been formed at Jefferson, Audover, and Geneva.

Mr. Geo. F. Rust, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., inquires about circulars, plans of organization, and so forth. The "Demands of Liberalism," and the article headed "Organize!" have been put into the form of cheap tracts, which will be sent on application from the office of THE INDEX. Mrs. M. A. McCord, President of the Liberal League at St. Louis, sends five dollars for a thousand of them. She kindly adds: "Our League deeply sympathizes with you. . . . THE INDEX is the organ through which the League expects to work."

Miss J. P. Titcomb, one of the secretaries of the Boston League, sends a very interesting letter, stating that one meeting "netted some sixty names" to the list of membership. There is great wisdom in these words of hers: "There are doubtless many who would gladly see the end attained of the divorce of Church and State, but are afraid that an announcement of active work on the liberal side will only serve to tighten the bonds now riveted by official hands. Yet the history of many successful reforms (that of our own oft-quoted anti-slavery struggle standing as a shining instance on the list) seems to prove that a bold start and unflinching warfare is the wisest and most promising course." While the Christianizers rely avowedly on the co-operation of the women of America in their bigoted movement, it is a good sign that some of the best and noblest of these do not hesitate to identify themselves with a movement which aims at diametrically opposite ends.

Mr. J. S. Burchard, of Leslie, Michigan, suggests that "the custom of railroad companies granting ministers half-fare rates or free passes should be abolished."

An anonymous party sends back from New York City a copy of the "Demands of Liberalism," with the word "demand" everywhere erased, and the word "recommend" substituted in its stead. A good soul in St. Louis, who also forgot to sign his name, but avows himself a "very old Wesleyan Methodist," says imploringly: "I endorse every demand you make, but for God's sake do not press the question or your requests in the form you do. It breathes revolution in every line. Many good people are not yet ready for the question as you offer it. 'We demand' is very peremptory, and signifies that it must be so. Brother, let us have peace." To these well-meant suggestions the words of Garrison come up as the most fitting reply: "I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice." The spirit of conciliation is beautiful in its place and season; but there are times when, in the presence of violated rights, one should forget to say please. Haughty and arrogant as the spirit of Orthodoxy shows itself, even in this land of boasted liberty, the freeman's heart rebels at assuming the attitude of a petitioner for that absolute equality before the law which by right is his already. I cannot persuade myself to any softer phrase than—"We demand." Let it stand unweakened and unrevoked. To those who think it too harsh or stern, the following letter may prove a tonic:—

MAHANOEY CITY, March 22, 1873.

Yesterday a pamphlet was handed to me in which were printed the demands of the Liberals of America with regard to the government. The doctrine of your demands clearly shows that your League is the body-guard of the Devil's army in our country; and really it would be in one sense desirable to see you, as the leading spirit of the Fool's-party. You, as the man whose name is below the nine demands, I would call a fool. Every school boy should call you so. Every Christian should take it up, until that name should sound and resound throughout the length and breadth of our land, and the word should sound in your ears and haunt you day and night, until, if possible, you could repent of your follies and be saved. Arguments so strong and convincing can be produced against your theory as would make the Devil himself tremble. I wish I could confront you face to face. But all I hope and pray for is that God would mete out to you the just punishment which you and your party deserve, during times of grace, so you will not be forever lost. God forbid that the blood of our pious men who established this great country should have been spilled in vain. If you desire to argue with me [!], I will cheerfully reply. You will please address B. H. Scheffer, Mahanoy City, Schuylkill County, Pa.

TO FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

N. B.—The very book you desire to abolish from schools is or was the foundation of our freedom. It was the light and guide of those who framed our Constitution. But enough this time.

B. H. S.

I print the above as illustrating a spirit which is widespread through the more thinly populated portions of the country. In the cities it is rarely found in such refreshing intensity; and radicals often grow sceptical as to its existence anywhere to-day. But it nevertheless abounds. The word "paganism" arose because the old polytheism lingered longest in the rural districts of the Roman Empire. Christianity itself is rapidly becoming the "paganism" of the nineteenth century.

Does any Liberal feel inclined to "recommend" to Mr. Scheffer the exclusion of the Bible from the schools?

F. E. A.

Rev. Dr. Newman, Methodist Chaplain of the U. S. Senate, has been appointed by President Grant Inspector of Consuls, which requires of him to take a pleasure trip round the world. Doubtless the doctor needs this relaxation after so laborious a season of prayer as was required to keep his senators virtuous. The prayer-test in his hands failed, however; for many of his prayer-subjects sadly deflected from the straight and narrow path.

THE WOMAN QUESTION.

It is the frequent boast of the advocates of Christianity, as an established Church and a historical religion, that it has done more than any other agency to elevate the condition of woman.

They have this proof in their favor, that in the foremost Christian nations of to-day woman occupies a freer and better position than in any other part of the world; but how far this is due to the direct teaching of the Church, and how far to the old Germanic idea of woman, and to the advance of civilization through the mingling of Greek and Roman elements with it, it would take long to determine. If we go back to the spirit and character of Jesus of Nazareth himself, uncontaminated by alliance with the authority of the State, we find much which if carried out would tend to the exaltation of woman. His own nature, so full of ideality and sentiment, his purely spiritual idea of religion, his contempt for the practical demands of circumstances, placed him in close relation with the tenderer sex. He evidently found in women his most appreciative and congenial friends. Then his own teachings were against that appeal to the law of force, that deification of physical strength, on which the advocates of masculine superiority so largely rest their claims. Unquestionably these influences have done their work in the Christian Church, though much counteracted by notions borrowed from other sources.

The belief that sin came into the world by woman, and the idea of the unholiness of marriage, have done their part in degrading the ideal and the life of woman; and, foreign as they seem to the thought of Jesus, they have played a large part in the Christian Church. It is constantly held out to women that in leaving the shelter of the Church they give up that protecting care which most truly elevates and ennobles them, and that the cold atmosphere of rational religion is unsuited to their tender growth. A preacher in Park Street Church is reported to have said: "Rational religion has no place for a child." But what is the attitude of Free Religion towards woman, and does it help the solution of the great question of the day?

There are two parts to the woman question, which are often confounded. One is a question of right; the other is a question of adaptation—or function. Has woman a right, as an individual being, to decide for herself according to her own reason and conscience as to her work in life, her relation to others, and the social arrangements under which she must live? The absolute Church, denying this right to human nature, of course refuses it to woman. Submission and obedience are the first of duties; and as the Church has established its hierarchy—"Christ the head of the Church, man the head of the woman"—of course there is no appeal from this decision.

Now this spirit, in more and more modified form, runs down through all ecclesiastical organizations; and even the freest of them lay great stress upon the injunctions of St. Paul, and feel that it is not for the individual woman herself to judge of her position and rights. But Free Religion settles this question at once. No man has authority to decide for another; no man is bound to yield obedience to any command or doctrine of another. Not unquestioning submission, but reasonable acceptance, is the true relation of the soul to all law and all teaching. Of course, if it acknowledges woman as a human being, the same right inheres in her. The monstrous doctrine of the English law, that a woman does not incur the guilt of murder if her husband commanded the deed, has no meaning for Free Religion. No one soul can take the guilt of another upon it; every one must bear its own burden. This perfect recognition of individual right of conscience at once settles the main question of who shall decide whether a woman may vote or work or preach or do anything which she is prompted to do by her own conscience and judgment. Her right is recognized.

But there is another element in Free Religion which is of great importance in this question; and that is its faith in Nature, in the immutability of her laws, in the certainty of her retributions, and the ultimate beneficence of her providence. Now the opponents of woman's freedom seem to imagine that the law of sex can be annulled; that God requires the assistance of their barriers and laws to keep man male and female as he made them, and that a free development is sure to result in the destruction of one or both. Free Religion has no such fears. It accepts all natural laws as good, and believes that the more freely they are allowed to act, the more perfectly they will work out their good results. "No place in rational religion for a child?" No; there is no place for a child as a little monster of total depravity, under the wrath of God, and needing to be reclaimed by a bloody sacrifice, lest his little skull should form a part of "the pavement of hell." We do not feel the need of putting him upon "anxious seats" to harrow his little soul with fears of eternal punishment, or to awaken a morbid self-introspection that will poison all his life. In the atmosphere of Free Religion the child grows up in a glad joy in God and Nature, himself and his earthly destiny; and the sense of immortality steals in upon him as the natural succession and fulfillment of the life that now is.

And so woman in Free Religion feels no fetters upon her spirit, and in developing her own nature does not shrink from accepting its conditions or limitations, whatever they may be, if only they are the natural ones, and not the artificial barriers set up by authority or custom. She asks the full development of her physical strength and health; and then if man has more muscular power, let him use it for the general good, as she will whatever special faculty she has. The bird that flits through the air with perfect freedom, knows no grief that it cannot dart through the water like a fish; but confine it by artificial barriers and it is wretched. So woman in perfect freedom finding her own sphere, will be safe and happy in it; but let her liberty be bounded by artificial lines, and all the comforts and luxuries you can bestow upon her will not console her for the want of it. Christianity has given woman tenderness, and reverence, and adoration even; but Free Religion gives her freedom and the full opportunity for self-development. Whatever of tenderness or reverence is really her due, will remain to her, and the loss of the rest will only make her life truer and more healthy. E. D. C.

LONDON LETTER.

THE CUSTOM OF WEARING "MOURNING"—THREE GOOD OBJECTIONS TO IT STATED.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I will follow up my last letter on funeral rites by a few remarks on the custom of wearing black as a sign of mourning for the dead.

The most obvious objections to it are—that it adds unnecessarily to the gloom and dejection already caused by bereavement, where grief really exists; that where there is no real grief, the putting on of signs of grief is a contemptible sham; that the custom of wearing "mourning" tends greatly to perpetuate unhappiness—and, as I conceive, false—views of death; and it is also objectionable in being compulsory upon many families who are too poor to bear the expense. I will say something upon each of these objections.

1. That it adds needlessly to the gloom and dejection of really afflicted relatives must be apparent to all who have ever taken part in these miserable rites. The houses are generally closed until the burial is over, and this of itself is a glaring instance of self-inflicted torture. When the physical frame is already weakened by long watchings, want of sleep, and floods of tears, common sense would direct the sufferers to seek the refreshing stimulants of air and sunshine; to throw open doors and windows and let in God's heavenly messengers of "sweetness and light;" to endeavor to turn the thoughts as much as possible away from the troubled past, and to relieve the dull pain at the heart by objects and occupations of cheerfulness; to avoid a darkened chamber, or a black dress, as one would avoid the devil—if there were any such "enemy of mankind." But no sooner is the breath gone from the body of one of the household, than all the blinds are drawn down and the shutters closed, and a fearful race against time is begun with the horrid preparations for "mourning." Dress-makers are in demand, the anxieties of economical shopping are multiplied, often at the very time when every penny is needed for coming wants or for past doctor's bills. And all is black—crape—jet; everything hideously black, the blackness only deepened by the white cap or white edging in which it is set. A poor widow, for instance, must shudder afresh over all the realities of her woe, the first time she looks in the mirror after having put on the hateful garb. Her sorrow was surely enough without her being compelled to bear about on her own body its ghastly tokens. At the funeral, this is made worse still by "mourning" coaches, and that most repulsive thing that moves on earth—the hearse, with its plumes of black stuck all over it, waving and nodding like so many fiends mouthing at your grief as they are carrying off their prey. Long and costly handbags of crape and silk, dozens of costly black gloves which seldom fit, cloaks of the same eternal, infernal black,—all contrived to make you feel as miserable and wretched as possible, while the woe at your heart is almost unendurable! Why should we be reminded for months afterwards, by outward tokens, of our sad loss? Every time we brush the little ring of hat left us by the undertaker, we are carried back to that terrible day on which the crape or cloth was first put on, and the very things we ought to try to forget are forced upon our notice at every turn in our lives.

2. But when, as is often the case, there is no real grief, but perhaps a good deal of real rejoicing over the death, the putting on of "mourning" is a piece of hypocrisy and falsehood which nothing can justify. No one will contend that "mourning" is anything else than a sign of grief; therefore if the sign be assumed when there is no grief, it is an acted lie, and helps to corrupt society and make it love shams and pretences and varnished deceit. I greatly honor those really broken-hearted widows who keep their "mourning" on all their days, for it is with them a true token, an outward and visible sign of an inward and heartfelt grief which must abide with them through all their weary pilgrimage; but I utterly despise the custom of putting on "mourning" because it is the fashion, and because "people would talk so, you know," if the "mourning" were to be omitted. As a sign of grief, "mourning" would often be much more suitable before the death than after it, inasmuch as the grief of watching a beloved one pass through weeks and weeks of physical torture, with the certainty of no recovery, far exceeds the grief of bereavement. It is only a truism to say that death is often the greatest possible relief to the poor sufferer himself, and to the sorrowing relatives. The number of cases in which the grief before far exceeds the grief after death, is much larger than is generally supposed.

3. I come now to the last and perhaps most important objection of all. "Mourning" tends to perpetuate unhappy and false views of death. To those who have no belief in immortality and re-union with our dear ones after death, it might seem only natural to give oneself up to despair and to all its horrible outward signs. But to those who profess to believe, and who really do believe, that the dead are still living in a happier world, free from earthly pain and sorrow, it ought to be quite natural to rejoice and give thanks "that it hath pleased Almighty God to take unto himself the soul of the departed, and to deliver him from the miseries of a sinful world,"—to quote from the Christian Burial Service. Death ought to be looked upon as at least as much of a heavenly boon to the beloved one, as a source of bitter pain to ourselves. But that pain itself would be greatly diminished if we were trained to think of death as we are trained to talk about it; if we were brought up to feel that it is a manifest and real benefit, and however distressing to survivors, is not to be regarded from its dark side. By refusing to darken our homes and to gird ourselves in black raiment, we would make our protest against the melancholy—the unmitigated melancholy—of the popular views of death. We would shake off as much as we could that morbid weeping and sighing which is so destructive to health and enfeebling to the mind. We would let the world know that however great our loss, however irreparable it might be on earth, we still trusted in the loving kindness of God, and unselfishly resigned into his hands the soul of our nearest and dearest, believing that he can and will, as a faithful Creator, give us a happy meeting in a brighter home above.

I have myself resolved never to put on "mourning" again—not even for my children or my wife; and I will do my best to persuade others to get rid of this most cruel and oppressive burden. (In the case of a public "mourning," I would make an exception; but this would be altogether on different grounds, and would be worn for the sake of strangers who know not my private opinions.) One thing seems very clear; it is our bounden duty to mitigate and remove all the grief we possibly can. We have no right to add to our natural distress by artificial means, nor to bemoan any loss longer than we can possibly help. If we believed in God and in his fidelity more, we should be the better assured of our meeting again beyond the tomb.

I am, sir, yours very sincerely,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

VOICES FROM THE INDEX CONSTITUENCY.

ACTING EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

While the writer of this is eager to endorse the claim of your correspondents of last week, that Mr. Abbot is the soul of THE INDEX, and that without him it would not have existed, and, it is more than probable, would not long survive his entire withdrawal,—there occurs to him another consideration which was entirely ignored in your issue of the fifth instant. While few if any stockholders expect a pecuniary return from their investment, they have invested their money, and assumed the legal responsibility, with the implied understanding that the business department shall be conducted under precisely the same conditions as are recognized to be essential to the success of any like undertaking. To this end, the financial management has been entrusted to a Board of Directors, chosen by the stockholders, whose duty it is to supervise all business arrangements, and who are supposed to possess the experience requisite to make the enterprise self-sustaining and, if possible, capable of future growth and expansion.

Now with all deference to the zeal and intellectual ability of Mr. Abbot, of which his past course furnishes overwhelming proof, it does not seem either wise or prudent to virtually surrender the control of the business of the Association into the hands of any one man, however honest or capable. While Mr. Abbot's individual force and self-sacrifice has undeniably been the main element in attracting the present large subscription, the point has been reached when the capital at stake must, for the welfare of the journal itself and the protection of the interest of the shareholders, be guarded and controlled by the men who have been chosen for the purpose, and whose business knowledge and experience, it is presumed, fit them for the task. I cannot but entertain the fear that Mr. Abbot, in striving after his lofty ideal, has overlooked the practical, worldly demands of business where ideal views are likely to prove hindrances rather than helps, and where necessity frequently requires the relinquishment of one's wishes for the more urgent and immediate demand of current wants. I think, therefore, that under the circumstances the course of the Directors, in claiming to continue the financial control in their own hands, has been wise and prudent; and I trust that, for the sake of the great cause to which Mr. Abbot is willing to so nobly devote his ability and energy, he may be induced to reconsider and modify his position which, from any standpoint, seems somewhat ambitious and, certainly at this juncture, impolitic. I confidently believe that in these views, which though plainly expressed are offered in all kindness, no inconsiderable portion of the stockholders will coincide; and I would therefore ask for them the same publicity which you have permitted to the other side.

Yours respectfully,

G. K. WILKINGTON.

CINCINNATI, April 7, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Will you allow me to call attention to the following paragraph in my article entitled "The Plain Truth," published in THE INDEX of March 29, which I see has been overlooked by Mr. Wilkinson?

"It is unnecessary to repeat what I have already said in effect, that I have no wish whatever to have the 'uncontrolled' management of the funds and business of the Association. I should much prefer, in the business department, to be subject to a Board which recognized the necessity of leaving the editor wholly free, and of making the transaction of business simply a means to the great end of establishing a first-class journal worthily devoted to the radical cause."

In other words, the business manager should be subordinate to the Board as the ultimate appeal in all business matters; and in no other sense have I ever been, or ever desire to be, business manager of the Index Association. Mr. Wilkinson is entirely correct in his views on this point; and I can but regret the persistent effort now made by the signers of the "Business Notice" to misrepresent me concerning it, as if I had ever held, much less urged, any different views. The original understanding and agreement was that I should have a general direction of the ordinary or office business of the Association, subject of course to the Directors; I never proposed or desired any other arrangement. What I wanted was simply the power to prevent any disreputable or questionable practices in the common business transactions of which the Directors would be ignorant; for, as I told the Board on Nov. 17, 1871, in the improbable case that the Directors themselves should do what I thought wrong I "held the remedy in my own hands; namely, prompt resignation." I certainly never expected that they would supersede me by a business manager in whose hands the true interests of the Association are thoroughly unsafe.

WIVES AND MONEY.

[From the Woman's Journal.]

Of all the little foxes that help to destroy the domestic vines, no one is more omnipresent, or busy, than that small pest which infests alike the houses of the rich and of the poor, which makes it necessary for the wife to ask her husband for money to supply the daily recurring family necessities, and her own.

It inevitably creates discontent, a sense of humiliation, degradation, and separation. The woman who had earned, and been free to use her weekly wages, or yearly salary, or larger income, before her marriage, and after that event, though her time is more fully occupied than ever, has no money except at her asking—and not always then—feels just as a man would feel who should be placed in the same circumstances.

She gave up her opportunity to acquire money by the usual methods, for the sake of the home and the family.

To this end she devotes her time, thoughts, and efforts, every day, and all the year, without cessation or vacation.

But custom everywhere, and law in many places, puts all the money of the family in the hands of the husband. The wife lives as a dependant. She has what is given her, cheerfully or grudgingly, as the case may be, but inevitably learns to hate her position, and to grow away from the man who gives only when he is asked. It may be mere thoughtlessness on his part, but the result with the wife is the same.

One of the most fruitful sources of discontent in the home is the too dependent position of the wife. If husbands would consider what it would be to them to be situated precisely in the same way, so far as money is concerned, every just and generous man among them would see to it at once, that his house should not hold so fruitful a source of unhappiness.

Many years ago, an excellent man told me his experience in this particular. He had not been married a year, but he noticed a change in the look and manner of his wife—she seemed less cheerful, less happy. The old glad welcome at his daily return from business had ceased. He knew no reason for the change. He sincerely loved her, and was miserable when he saw that she was not even comfortable as his wife. This state of things must not be endured if it could be cured. So he asked her frankly what was the matter, at the same time telling her that above all things he wished to promote her happiness.

Then she answered frankly: "You know that before our marriage I collected my own dividends, and the money I had was my own, to use as I chose, and it was all I needed. Since we were married you collect my income, and I never have a cent for any purpose, except when I ask you for it. It seems to me that if you cared for me in the least, you could not subject me to such humiliation. Look at these slippers; I have worn them beyond all decent use, because I could not ask for the money necessary to buy new ones. I feel it a degradation, just as you would, if you were in my place."

"Could you endure it, if I had the money, and you had none, only as you got it by asking me for it? I used to teach six hours, and had the whole remaining day for my pleasure. Now, all my time is occupied; I have neither money nor leisure, and I feel just like a pauper or a beggar, and I wish I were dead." Then she burst into tears, and cried as though her heart would break.

With an immense sense of relief, he asked: "Is that all?" "All!" said she, "it is enough to kill any woman."

The dreadful fear that she had ceased to love him, or that she loved some one else, fled. The whole matter was talked over with the largest freedom, until the husband said he seemed to himself to have been unspokeably mean.

"To think," said he, "that I had ever offered her just the twenty cents which she said she needed to buy pins, or the six cents necessary for shoe strings, and had not once thought that she must need more for other things, while all her time was devoted to make a comfortable home for me!" As a result of the explanation, the husband every week put a sum of money, double what his wife thought she would need, where she could get it without asking.

The young wife's face grew glad again. The feeling of pauper and beggar vanished. The end of the year showed a bank account of seven hundred dollars in the name of the wife, saved carefully from the money she had not needed to use. The only root of bitterness there had ever been between them was plucked up. Peace and comfort returned and flourished. The story of this wife is the story of many others.

Sometimes, the law will recognize the undoubted right of the wife to her full share of the money value which accrues to the marriage firm.

Until that time, the thoughtlessness of really good men may be cured by the frank speech of the wife, who is daily hurt by a feeling of dependence which ought never to exist between the equally valuable partners in the home.

There are plenty of spendthrift wives and husbands, who waste the common substance and that of each other. They must always suffer loss. But the great majority of married couples bear each their natural share of the family burden, care, and toil, and they should be alike independent in money matters. L. S.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Briggs' New Quarterly Catalogue, issued by Briggs & Brother, Rochester, N. Y., has several novelties in the way of illustrations. The cover we do not understand, we cannot describe—it is beyond our powers of description. It is gold, and gilt, and goddess, and brown, and bronze, and black, flowers, screens and pedestals, all sketched in a way we have never seen before; while the last page resembles the title of a Japanese bible. Throwing all humor aside (for we like the firm—its respectability and good character and enterprise are beyond question), the interior of the catalogue is equal to the best issued by American seedsmen. The colored plate of the new cockscomb is really a beauty; so also the plate of Verbena, a novel form of colored plant, with pink and other colors on a black ground; also the engravings of the numerous chromes are well executed.—Horticulturalist, New York.

AND

Christian Spiritualist.

BEING A SYNOPSIS OF THE INVESTIGATION OF SPIRIT INTERCOURSE BY AN EPISCOPAL BISHOP, THREE MINISTERS, FIVE DOCTORS AND OTHERS AT MEMPHIS, TENN., IN 1853; ALSO, THE OPINION OF MANY EMINENT DIVINES, LIVING AND DEAD, ON THE SUBJECT, AND COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED FROM A NUMBER OF PERSONS RECENTLY.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON

OF THE

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "Clock Struck One" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century; a man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North, and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference, of which the author is a member, in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

MODERN THINKER--NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ere this have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all bookshelves know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give intolerance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

[From the Westminster Review.]

Modern Scepticism.—Faith and Free Thought.

If there be one sign of the times more patent than any other to the eye of the dispassionate observer, it is to be found in the gradual decay of the old theological beliefs. The condition of religious thought in Germany is too well known to readers of this Review to render any further allusion to it necessary; and the subject has been brought under the notice of the general reader in a series of able sketches by the correspondent of the leading journal at Berlin. In France, the recent discussions in the Protestant Synod have brought to light the startling fact that a large proportion of French reformers have altogether thrown over a belief in miracles. We are in possession of evidence which would tend to show the immense progress of rationalistic views in America. We are, however, not concerned with these and other foreign countries just now, and must dismiss them with the remark that it would be indeed a strange phenomenon if a great mental movement, which is making itself so sensibly felt in other Protestant communities, should have no counterpart in Protestant England. It is of England that we wish to speak; and we say not only that it might be expected from what is witnessed elsewhere, but also that there is evidence that it is making very great progress. We are aware that in putting forth this statement, we are at issue with some great authorities; for example, the Times newspaper, and apparently Mr. Disraeli. In the opinion of the statesman speaking not long ago at Manchester, the objections of scepticism have been victoriously refuted over and over again by "inexorable logic." If this be so, then the unbelievers, being altogether an unreasoning, illogical class of men, can never hope to make progress, and may safely be neglected; like the gentleman who laid a wager the other day that the earth was flat. The Times newspaper takes very much the same view. In an article on the Duke of Somerset's volume, the reviewer seems to contemplate "fashionable scepticism" (for the existence of an infidel tailor or shoemaker here and there may perhaps be admitted) as the crochets of a few idle dilettanti, anxious to cut a figure in west-end drawing-rooms by their paradoxes. Probably a good-sized drawing-room would hold them all; and if by chance, or by a special interposition, the roof should fall in on them so collected together, we presume that no more would be heard of their silly notions in "west-end circles" for a generation at least! The same sort of language might doubtless have been heard in certain Roman "circles" with regard to Christianity, for centuries after the death of its founder. "A superstition confined to slaves and half-splitting Greeks, 'woolweavers, shoemakers, fullers, and rustics' (these are the words of Celsus), with here and there a Tertullian and a Cyprian recruited from the ranks of advocates and teachers of rhetoric, or a philosophic pervert like Justin Martyr or Athenagoras. We do not profess to know exactly what the religion of these people is, but it must have existed a long time and made very little way; for we remember reading about it in our college days, in the days of Tacitus and the younger Pliny. Marcus Aurelius has noticed it, and Lucian too, by the by. And we believe that Celsus has taken the trouble to write against it. But as a general rule, none of our philosophers or historians or poets have thought it worth their while to take the least notice of it. No doubt the thing goes on, and converts are made; but one never hears anything about them in society except now and then when the emperors see fit to come down upon these lunatics." Such we may be sure was the sort of language used in fashionable company in the reign of Decius, and in the hearing of children whose old age was destined to witness the worldly triumph of the "deadly superstition," and the head of the State yielding spiritual obedience to the "Galilean juggler."

If we wanted any confirmation of the truth of our statement, we might refer to witnesses on the Orthodox side more competent from their position and the character of their studies to pronounce an opinion than Mr. Disraeli and the writer in the Times. What is the language of such men as Archbishop Thomson, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Dean Goulburn, Professor Mozley, Canon Liddon, Mr. Farrar, and a host of others; in fact, of all recent Christian apologists? We read of "a wide-spread movement of the mind indicative of the first stealing over the sky of the lurid lights which shall be shed profusely around the great Antichrist." [Bishop of Winchester. Preface to "Reply to Essays and Reviews," p. xi.] "The wide-spread movement against miracles." ["Mozley on Miracles," ch. ii.] "A wide-spread unsettlement of religious belief . . . an impression that the age is turning its back on dogmas and creeds." [Liddon. Preface to "The Divinity of Our Lord," p. xvi.] "The frightful prevalence of sceptical views among all classes of the community." [Goulburn. Preface to Bishop Magee's "Pleadings for Christ," p. i.] "A wide-spread defection from the faith which our fathers held." [Farrar. "Witness of History to Christ," p. viii.] "A time of much doubt and trial." [Archbishop Thomson. Preface to "Aids to Faith."] While a statesman who is at the same time a theologian, has not hesitated to speak of "hosts mustering and fields clearing for the greatest struggle which Christianity has ever had to face." [Marquis of Salisbury. Speech at Liverpool, April, 1872.] Utterances of this kind might be quoted to any extent; the stray specimens which we have given show that the Orthodox are at length awakening to the real character of the peril which threatens them. In Sheridan's comedy of the "Critic," one of the characters in the burlesque is rebuked by Puff (at least it used so to be acted by Mr. Charles Mathews, though whether to be found in the original we do not recollect), for looking out for the advent of an incoming personage on the wrong side of the stage. This is very much what the bulk of the moderate and Low-Church clergy and laity have been doing for some time past. They have been looking out for the advent of Romanism on one side, while Scepticism has been stalking in on the other.

In truth, no person who has looked beneath the surface of society can be in the least doubt as to the correctness of what is here advanced. Scepticism, if not rampant, will be found to be latent in the most unexpected quarters. Even if, at any time and place, we felt ourselves at liberty to mention the names of men eminent in the senate, at the bar, in the pulpit, from whose lips we have heard a practical disclaimer of all dogma, we should refrain from doing so, owing to our recollection of a jocosse piece of advice once given to us by Minister (afterwards President) Buchanan. "Young gentlemen," said he, "you have just told a story of something you saw in the United States, which I happen to know is true. But don't tell it again, for your own sake. Very few will believe you. Rather relate something which is not true, and which will be believed." Readers of Hawthorne will remember his exquisitely philosophical tale of "Goodman Brown;" how the poor man, on being persuaded to go to a witch's meeting, found his wife, his pastor, his seemingly virtuous old school-mistress, and all the most esteemed of his neighbors there. So, if any one should be brought to conceive doubts, let him go about and enquire, and he will extract similar doubts from the learned college tutor, the Orthodox rector, the tory squire, the Independent or Baptist leader. Every one remembers the story told (if we remember rightly) by Seneca, of the proposal which was made in the Roman Senate, to clothe the slaves in a distinctive dress, and of the reasons which were urged successfully against the project. If every sceptic were clothed in a like uniform to-morrow, we are of opinion that the result would be just as striking to all parties.

More than this, to any one who looks, not necessarily beneath the surface, but merely at the surface of things, it must be obvious that there are some strange appearances in the sky, though we do not regard them, with the early Christians and the Bishop of Winchester, as indicating the return of Nero, or of antichrist in any form. Nothing is more remarkable than the change in educated feeling which has taken place within the last thirty years; that is, within the recollection of men of middle age. We remember the time when an "infidel," a person who did not believe in the literal inspiration of the Bible, was to us a dark, malignant being, capable of every atrocity. We looked upon him as the ignorant pagans looked upon the Christian who refused to worship their gods, or as this same Christian contemplated the pagan demons by whom he believed himself to be surrounded. Now, on the slightest provocation, over the evening cigar, or it may be from fair lips at the dinner-table, free-thinking sentiments are uttered which would certainly at that time have relegated the speaker to Coventry. We should suppose that at the Athenæum Club, with its body-guard of bishops, a notorious unbeliever was once as rare a sight as a general smoking a short clay pipe on the steps of the Senior United. We have lived to witness both these phenomena, which, in the opinion of Dean Close and the Anti-Tobacco League, may have some connection with each other. In those days, infidel books were produced in dark shops and obscure alleys, somewhere in the neighborhood of Holborn and Temple Bar, whence the works of Tom Paine were occasionally smuggled into their dormitories by sixth-form boys at public schools. Now, the first publishers announce edition after edition of volumes, bearing eminent names, and which are as distinctly hostile to what is commonly called revelation as anything that Tom Paine ever wrote. A similar change has come over the spirit of the periodical press. Not to say anything of this Review, which may at any rate claim to have held its present views in days when they were far less popular, able publications have sprung up like our contemporaries the Fortnightly and the Contemporary, in which it must certainly be admitted that theological subjects receive a "free handling." A much stronger term might be used to designate some bold and spirited, but too contemptuous articles which have appeared in Fraser, with the well-known initials "L. S." And the ablest of the London evening papers, the Pall Mall Gazette, has long been noted for articles, the tone of which may be judged by the following extracts:

"A third answer is, well, the whole subject (of religion) is involved in mystery; and whether the religion to which you have been accustomed is or is not exactly what one would call true, in that coarse and vulgar sense of the word in which we speak of a statement about common things being true, it is eminently respectable and useful; and, on the whole, speaking generally and subject to reasonable exceptions and modifications, it is not altogether improbable that the best course, at all events for the present, would be to take it as being about as true as it can reasonably be expected to be. . . . The third answer is that of the great majority of practical persons."—Pall Mall Gazette, June 3, 1872.

"The real question is not about the Athanasian Creed or the details of Mr. Bennett's language about the Sacrament; it is whether the whole Christian religion is or is not based on truth; and out of every seven members of the representative body of the French Protestant Church, four think that it is, and three that it is not. If any one supposes that questions which are asked under such circumstances, and which receive such answers at Paris, are not being asked and will not have to be answered in London, he does greatly err."—Pall Mall Gazette, July 4, 1872.

"The excessive activity of the clergy about all kinds of practical matters and petty doctrinal questions was probably never exceeded, but none or hardly any of them do the one thing that is indispensable. They do not give to the questions proposed to them answers as direct, pointed, and emphatic as the questions themselves. It is as if an invading army were marching upon London, and public meetings were being held all over London, voting against the enemy, considering how people may be got to dislike him, passing resolutions condemning his proceedings, and, in short, doing every sort of thing except meeting and beating him."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 1, 1872.

The same change has manifested itself in the case of the provincial press. From the Scotsman, at Edinburgh, to the Western Morning News, at Plymouth, articles and reviews have of late appeared which completely strike at the root of the old doctrine of Biblical inspiration. After all this, well might Mr. Gladstone say, when speaking at Willis's Rooms in May last on behalf of King's College: "What is so common as to find, in the very best type, and in the best bindings, on the tables of drawing-rooms and of clubs, works in which Christianity is spoken of as an antiquated superstition?" And Mr. Farrar tells us that "the vital doctrines of Christianity have to be defended against whole literatures, against whole philosophies!"

More than this. The reader whose attention has been at any time drawn in this direction can scarcely have failed to notice that there is a large and increasing body of educated men in England (we might almost include in their number the bulk of the educated classes), Orthodox in name, but whose theological views, if put down upon paper, would be anything but satisfactory to an Orthodox examiner. These are men faithful to the offices of religion, who subscribe to churches and chapels and missions, who form the strength of the Church and the more educated dissenting sects. The precise character of their religious belief is a mystery to themselves; they hold what a learned professor of our friends once called a kind of smudgy Christianity; and, as they are particularly reticent on these points, it is very difficult for an outsider to form an idea of their creed. Yet, like every one else, they have their moments of expansion, and then we learn that, like Coleridge (who on this, as well as on all other subjects, was pre-eminently "smudgy"), they are satisfied with the Bible, "because it finds them, more than all other books put together; finds them at greater depths of their being," without pledging themselves to the dogma that every word in it is necessarily inspired. The attitude of their minds towards the greater number of the Old Testament miracles may be described as one of benevolent haziness. They may be literally true, or true only after some figurative and allegorical fashion; either way, they are parts of a sublime system, and, even if they were shown to be quite untrue, it would not, in the least, matter. Supposing all Bishop Colenso's finikin criticisms to be established, how would they affect the doctrine of the atonement? Supposing Methuselah did not live nine hundred and odd years, the Sermon on the Mount will none the less live till the end of the world. What does it matter whether there be a personal tempter or not? Surely there is implanted in us all a tendency to go wrong; and does not that amount to exactly the same thing? Of course they do not believe in the hell of Mr. Spurgeon (nor consequently, we must take the liberty of pointing out to these good people, in the hell of Jesus, for they are identical), but in the consequences of evil deeds following their perpetrator in some mysterious way into another world. Some of them are quite willing to give up the Apocalypse, others the Book of Daniel, others the Song of Solomon, others to our knowledge even the accounts of the Nativity, as possibly a legend that has been tacked on to the sacred narrative. They all of them repudiate the idea that men may be condemned hereafter for "honest mistakes," or "errors in belief conscientiously arrived at," as uncharitable and immoral. The extent to which these kinds of views are prevalent is not suspected by such of the clergy as do not share them; and, by the way, many, especially of the younger clergy, do share them. We say that there is scarcely an educated family in the land in which one or more of its members may not be found holding opinions such as these; and whatever judgment we may pass on them, it must at any rate be admitted that they are not identical with, that they are indeed diametrically opposed to, the tenets of Orthodox Christianity.

Concurrently with this phenomena of the advance of the sceptical and semi-sceptical views in England, we observe another one, common to England and all Christian countries, and which, though inseparably connected with the former, we may be permitted, in our brief limits, to characterize in a rough way separately, as the decay from internal causes of dogmatic theology. We believe that there is nothing within our cognizance upon which Time will not operate; that for Kronos, as for the French sapeur, nothing is sacred. If this be so, the popular Christianity of the nineteenth century could not possibly be the same Christianity as that of the first and second centuries. At any rate, it is not. The early Christian, if recalled to life, would be utterly bewildered at the loose way in which his creed at present sits upon its most eminent professors; at seeing them burn incense to gods, whom though not bearing the names of heathen deities, he would none the less stigmatize as idols and demons. To him, it would be altogether astounding and abnormal that this world should be now-a-days so much to everybody, when the very key-note of his creed is that it should be next to nothing—vilius aliquid; that even the so-called "regenerate" should be devoting themselves with so much assiduity to worldly pursuits and money-making, during the brief interval of time which separates them from an eternity which, for all but a few, must be an eternity of physical torment; that bishops and deans should be consorting peacefully with the worldly, and looking out for good matches for their daughters from among them; that the Scriptures should not be consulted in every difficulty to which they apply, but, on the contrary, quietly ignored or, if need be, set aside; that all reference to them should be tabooed in the legislature and in polite society as "in bad taste;" that subjects of the highest, indeed to him of the only, interest should be treated with a languid indifference; that the debates in Convocation about the Athanasian Creed, and the procession of the Holy Ghost, should not awaken infinitely more attention than the debates on the Public Health and Ballot Bills. In short, the "secular spirit," with which the course of time has rusted over the old original creed, would be an inexplicable portent to him. Sometimes, even now, a man of this type, a primitive Christian "born out of due time," starts up among us and strikes even his co-religionists as a being, strange and wild and out of place, like a Hebrew prophet at the court of a Jewish King—a Henry Martyn, for instance, who laments that he has been at a dinner-party without saying one word about Jesus; grieves at having thought so little about God on his way from Cambridge to London on the top of a stage-coach, and in the course of a walk through the city; is led to attend a Gresham lecture on music, and goes away, "unable to remain longer in such a dissipated, unholy state;" mourns over his having been induced to "look into a Review," and, being led on by "detestable curiosity about the impertinent subjects of literature," is thankful that he is not struck dead in church for not being more attentive in prayer. Yet Henry Martyn (a holy and conscientious man, if ever there was one in this world) was perfectly consistent; and the inconsistent people are those who, professing to hold what Henry Martyn held, do not act as Henry Martyn acted. We believe his views to have been in many respects radically unsound, and based on a false view of Divine Providence. Yet they were the views practically enforced by Jesus and still held up theoretically for our acceptance. The founder of Christianity compares his teaching to new wine poured into old bottles; but now the religion itself has become an old wine, from which the original ingredients have largely evaporated. Hell fire, the cultivation of poverty, blind indifference to the morrow, the practice of celibacy, the anticipation not to be laid aside for a moment of the immediate return of Christ, humble submission to injuries—these and many other ingredients have escaped and left it a religion tempered, and so to speak doctored, by long keeping, to the altered character of the times. Whether the world would be any the better if the precepts of Christianity were everywhere strictly carried out, is a point on which we are not called upon to enter. Suffice it that they are not so carried out—that they are softened down into meaning something which they did not originally mean. And this is a point not to be passed over in a notice of the scepticism of the age.

No wonder that these considerations—except indeed the last named, which they either fail to perceive or else shut their eyes to—have at length frightened the Orthodox. The tendency of frightened classes everywhere is to form some sort of organization for their protection; and the tendency of frightened classes in England is to place these organizations under the patronage of as many peers, millionaires, and members of Parliament as can be secured for the purpose. In some cases, meetings are held and addresses are delivered by men of reputation, with a lord, if possible, or a bishop in the chair. "The Society for the protection of the interests of brewers and licensed victuallers (President, Lord Grains) will hold the first of a series of meetings to be addressed by Sir Cocculus Indicus," &c., &c. We are all of us familiar with this kind of thing, and it cannot be denied that it may be of some service to a threatened cause. Just to be sure, as a meeting of the crew of a ship convened for its protection during a storm may be of service in that it may stimulate the sailors to greater activity. But the ship, and the interests of the licensed victuallers, and let us add those of so-called Orthodoxy—it may be well to remind these worthy people—are tossed on the crests of huge waves in the ocean of human progress, are as the playthings to tides in the affairs of collective mankind, which will flow on in their appointed course as ignorant of them as of Canute, and against which it may be as useless for them to contend with "meetings" and "lectures," as for savages to shoot up arrows into the sky to keep off an eclipse.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

It may be remembered that the amiable Mr. Maberley lived in Hanover street; and, as it happened, nearly opposite to the office of Mr. Dorton. Paul knew the house well enough, though he had not entered it for some years; in his juvenile days he had thought it something of a privilege to go thither to visit his "aunt" and her children—three handsome boys and a pretty little girl, whom he called his cousins. The eldest of these he recollected as an especial scapegrace, who, playing with him in the garden of his grandfather's house, had excited his horror by tilting a ladder over the wall and through an adjoining skylight, and by his subsequent hardihood and impudence when arraigned for the enormity before Mr. and Mrs. Gower. But this young gentleman was now in Paris, qualifying himself for his father's profession; and Paul's acquaintance with the family had terminated when sentence of outlawry had been passed upon Maberley by the old lady and gentleman.

The doctor's establishment had once been a fashionable one, and proportionately profitable—for he did not lack a certain sort of flashy ability—but his profligacy and extravagance had undermined his position; and he was now financially involved in debts and difficulties, living recklessly from day to day, with occasional intervals in a sponging-house, and a financial catastrophe always impending. It was said that his creditors had a bill of sale for his very furniture. Still he attempted to keep up appearances; jobbed a brougham, in which to pay his few professional visits, and entertained a man-servant in livery. Paul saw him, sometimes, darting furtively and rapidly out of the house into the vehicle aforesaid, and being driven off immediately, as if he dreaded detention; and also poor Mrs. Maberley, at the upper windows, with her younger children, who had come home from school for the Christmas holidays.

One afternoon there occurred an incident at the house opposite, of which both Paul and Richard Sabin—who sometimes strolled to Hanover Street and spent an hour with his friend, in the absence of Mr. Dorton—were the accidental spectators; an incident which was odiously suggestive of Maberley's habits and associates. They were reminded of it afterwards; for which reason, rather than its individual importance in this history, it is here related.

Dick, then, looking idly over the wire-blind of the office window, just as the street-lamps were being lighted, and while Paul was finishing his daily note to his employer, beheld, approaching from Regent Street, a woman whose appearance and behavior presently attracted his attention. A more repulsive person, attired in fine clothes, it would have been difficult to imagine. Evidently a French woman, she resembled nothing so much as one of those horrible females, whom, in his intense dislike to the lower order of foreigners, the late John Leech used sometimes to portray in the pages of Punch. With her greased and bandolined hair strained back from her low forehead; her lewd, leering, wicked eyes, deep-set in their shady sockets; her painted cheeks, protruding jaw and evil face, through which the shape of the skull was distinctly visible,—she was as ugly as ugly could be, yet maintained an assumption of the airs of a beauty and fascination in her looks and manner, at once preposterous and revolting. Very much over-dressed, with her head aloft, her skirts sweeping the slushy pavement behind and ostentatiously held up in front, she came staggering along, being evidently rather intoxicated, and more than indifferent to the regards of spectators, some of whom paused to look at her.

It might have been in consequence of her condition, and because the large, silvered door-plate of "Dr. James Maberley," shining bright in the gas-light, attracted her notice and inspired her with a sudden idea; it might have been previous intention, but whatever the reason, she paused and, steadying herself by holding on to the railings, ascended the steps and rang the bell. The door was opened almost immediately by the man-servant in livery, to whom—as could easily be discerned on the other side of the way—she addressed some inquiry, answered by a curt negative, a look of very natural surprise and repulsion, and the slamming of the door in her face. Instantly she seemed to get into a towering passion, and, applying herself again to the bell, tugged at it so furiously that the wire broke and the handle came away in her grasp, nearly throwing her backwards. Additionally enraged at this, she then began thundering at the knocker; at the sound of which formidable noise the by-standers drew nearer and formed the nucleus of a little crowd, which soon collected about the portal.

"Come along!" said Sabin whose view was now intercepted, and the two friends crossed the street together. Before they had gained the pavement, the uproar was redoubled. The door re-opening, the woman had precipitated herself on the footman like a fury, demanding with oaths and abuse, both in French and English, why he had dared to insult her, and insisting on immediate speech with his master.

"He's not at home, I tell you!" cried the man, struggling and terrified, for he was no match for his assailant, who had already torn his coat, and was menacing his face with her left claw, like a wild animal. "Police! will somebody fetch a policeman?" And "Po-lice!" echoed one or two voices among the mob, which increased every moment, while the rest of its component elements laughed or jeered, deriding the footman and exhorting the woman to "pitch into him," after the amiable custom of a London crowd in general.

Looking over the heads of the populace, Paul could discern only a confused struggle; the woman trying to force her way in, the man to prevent her, and presently, in the background, the alarmed countenances of Mrs. Maberley and two of her boys. He was just proclaiming himself a relative of the family and, backed by the broad-shouldered Richard, endeavoring to effect a rescue, when a cry was raised of "Here's a policeman!" and, pushing through the crowd in that unceremonious manner adopted by the force, a constable arrived on the scene. Almost simultaneously a cab drew up opposite the door, out of which looked the shallow, surprised eyes, the white teeth, and dyed whiskers of Mr. James Maberley.

The policeman had got the virago in his professional grasp—just above the right elbow—had addressed to her the usual assurance of recognition, and inquired of the man-servant "if he gave this person in custody?" with all possible civility. Unlike the ordinary behavior of her sex, she made no resistance, but, apparently rather shocked by her position, declared that the footman had outraged her and provoked his punishment by denying her access to his master, whose friend she was.

"Here's the gentleman; let's here what he says," cried two or three bystanders on the outskirts of the crowd. And Mr. Maberley, who, alighting, had consequentially demanded the cause of the disturbance, and announced his right to do so, found himself passed from hand to hand until he confronted the actors in it, when he would fain have retreated if the closing-in of the curious mob had not rendered flight impossible.

Directly she saw him, the Frenchwoman addressed the doctor with shrill volubility. "C'est toi done," she said, "l'arrive just à temps. Dis à ces canailles que je suis une des tiennes, et dis lui!" (saying to the policeman), "de fichez le camp. Ha! tu flanches?" for Maberley, reddening through his rouge at the shameful recognition and the coarse comments of the crowd, made an unsuccessful attempt to escape. "Ha! ha! l'es chomette. Eh ben! zut! d'campes! je lui donnerai du fil à torde avant qu'il me paume, et tu seras pentêtre — crane de me tirer du plan avant le matin!"

"No! no!" cried the wretched Maberley, as the woman shook herself free of the constable, tore off her bonnet and shawl—apparently by a simultaneous movement—and stood at bay, prepared for immediate hostilities; "for heaven's sake let's have no more disturbance! What is the matter? What has happened already?"

Plenty of voices volunteered the desired information, the policeman's account being the shortest and most coherent. "She's in custody for assaulting of him," he said, pointing with his thumb to the person concerned.

"It's all a mistake. You'll retract this charge, Charles—to oblige me?" The man looked surprised, and began a speech about his "having been" and "abused for nothing," but finally assented; at which decision the mob shouted louder than ever.

"And you, Héloïse," Mr. Maberley continued, in appropriate, because bad French—while he shrunk from the uncomplimentary regards of the crowd, and would have looked pale and red by turns, but for his paint—"will go home? There's a cab at your service."

"Not unless you go with me! I want to speak to you!" the woman answered, brazen, insolent, and imperative. And then, full in the outraged hearing of his wife and children, there ensued between Maberley and his associate a scandalous controversy, only concealed from the jeering mob by its being conducted in a foreign language. It ended, as might have been anticipated from the man's cowardice, in his succumbing to the demand made upon him. Secure of his assent, the Frenchwoman uttered a screech of triumph, clutched his arm, impudently faced the crowd, and ordered the policeman to clear the way to the cab.

The shouts, the laughter, the hisses, the outburst of ironical applause provoked by this behaviour, may be imagined. It required some activity and exercise of authority on the part of the openly contemptuous constable to disperse the mob sufficiently to allow the pair to beat a successful retreat. Maberley slunk into the vehicle looking so cowed, so shamefaced, so utterly despicable in mien and manner, that if he had been a felonious cur, with a halter round his neck, conveyed to summary execution, he would have presented a less repulsive spectacle. The woman, on the other hand, laughed in tipsy triumph, defied the populace, and waved her hand in mock adieu, as the cab drove off amid a perfect storm of reprobation.

Another policeman coming up at this juncture, and the door of the house being closed—not, however, before Paul caught a glimpse of Mrs. Maberley's face—the mob began gradually to move away. The rather strong observations on the doctor's conduct and character, in which the young men indulged as they walked eastwards, need not be recorded. Paul told the story to his grandparents when he got home, to Mrs. Gower's intense indignation. The old lady fully expected the arrival of her niece next morning, and, but for Mr. Gower's remonstrances, would have anticipated such an application by going to Hanover Street herself, to offer the injured wife her usual asylum during the crises of conjugal tribulation—and to relieve her own curiosity. But the old gentleman had a great deal to say about the injudiciousness of interference, and, for a wonder, prevailed. Nor did Mrs. Maberley appear; and not long afterwards, there occurred in the house near the Hampstead Road an event of such engrossing importance, that it left no room in the mind of the old lady for other considerations.

RELIGION IN GOVERNMENT.—As American citizens, we can never forget the ancient landmarks, and the foundations upon which our liberties have been erected. The U. S. Senate in one of the first treaties they ratified, during the last century, happily hit the nail upon the head when they said, "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded upon the Christian religion" (treaty with Tripoli and Barbary, Nov. 4, 1790), and we think that our Governors and State Legislatures act wisely when they make no attempt to teach Christianity.

The election of a Chaplain to the Legislature, or to a public institution, is contrary to the spirit of our laws, and we hope that the day will soon come when praying for the members will be done by the churches in the respective localities where they reside. It will produce a better effect than those of some clergyman who has been lobbied into the office of Chaplain, and then illegally paid for his party praying.—St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer.

Uncle Sam—a down east farmer known far and wide by this patriotic title—had a neighbor who was in the habit of working on Sundays; but after awhile this Sabbath breaker joined the church. One day our friend met the minister to whose church he belonged. "Well, Uncle Sam," said he, "do you see any difference in Mr. P— since he joined the church?" "Oh, yes," said Uncle Sam, "a great difference. Before, when he went out to mend his fences on Sunday he carried his axe on his shoulder, but now he carries it under his coat."

There is trouble over the income of Trinity Church, New York. A Sunday paper says the income of the church property amounts to $60,000,000. The Times denies this, remarking that it never amounted to that sum in any one year. A correspondent of that paper says the yearly income of the church from all sources has never exceeded $438,000. There may be an inside ring—a Credit Mobilier—connected with it and appropriating the chief portion of the funds.—Tolcan Blade.

The editor of the Allegan (Mich.) Journal went to church the other day, and after the regular service had closed and the customary exhortation given to speak, the minister inquired: "Who will be the first to speak?" Presently an elderly gentleman who weighs about three hundred pounds arose and humbly observed: "I believe it is the duty of the biggest sinner in the house to speak first—that's me, thank God!"

We are pleased to observe that the religious songs which were sung here by the Fiske University troupe are very popular among the students. These songs have an immense advantage over our sacred melodies. In singing them one combines amusement with religious worship.—The Dartmouth.

We recognize now the cause of their popularity at Amherst.—Amherst Student.

Mr. P. H. Bateson is no longer Business Manager of the Index Association, having resigned that position April 21. Henceforth all letters intended for this office should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 38."

We resume, this week, the regular acknowledgment of "Cash Receipts," the publication of which was suspended under the administration of the late business manager. The present acknowledgment includes cash receipts between the dates of March 15 and April 21, and their publication will hereafter be continued successively from the last-named date.

We once more devote a considerable portion of our space to matters of importance touching the Index Association. It is not our expectation, however, that it will be necessary to do this again before the Annual Meeting of the stockholders in June next; and although we have in our possession a large number of letters from subscribers and stockholders, some of which we had intended to print in part or entire, we deem it, under the present circumstances, undesirable to do so. Meanwhile we content ourselves with hoping and believing that out of this unhappy controversy the right will emerge and pass to that side which has been faithful to it.

The murder of Gen. Canby by the Indian Modoc chief, "Captain Jack," has excited a great deal of indignation throughout the country against the Indians, and a fierce cry for the extermination of all the Modocs and every other warring tribe is raised. Treacherous and cruel as are the savage red men, and deserving of punishment as they may be, we must remember, in palliation of their conduct, how long and greatly they have suffered at the hands of the Christian white man; how his greed and cunning and selfishness and rapacity have more than equalled their treachery and cruelty; how they have been deceived and cheated and plundered and robbed, hounded and driven from their homes and possessions, by those who claimed the right to the soil by virtue of being a superior race and having a diviner destiny. Christianity seems to know not how to civilize or Christianize races but by violence and fraud and persecution. It proselytes with the sword, it converts with the red right hand of force, it baptizes in blood before water. Its history plainly shows this to have been its method—to conquer and advance not by love and reason, but by authority and power. For the good of man, it is time that Christianity gave way to Natural Religion.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on May 29, 30.

Thursday evening, May 29, session for business and addresses at Parker Fraternity Hall. At this meeting, the question of Radical organization, including that of forming "Liberal Leagues," will be discussed.

Friday, May 30, forenoon and afternoon, Convention for essays and addresses in Tremont Temple. On Friday evening, a Social Subscription Festival is to be held, at which there will also be brief speeches.

A specially attractive Convention, having new features of interest, is anticipated. Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the Boston papers.

Secretary.

NATURAL RELIGION.

Whatever religion is not natural, is false, and must eventually pass away. For God himself never did, and we believe never can, make a religion for man, or reveal one to him, more divine or more ennobling than that which human nature itself has been proven capable of suggesting and sanction. That religion which harmonizes and unifies mankind, which makes men brothers, proving to them their common origin, common destiny, and common nature,—that is the divinest and the truest religion. But it is very plain that so-called "revealed" religion does not do this. All its history shows that, so far from making men brothers, it has made them antagonistic and warring sectarians and partisans; so far from producing harmony and peace among men, it has produced monstrous strife and discord; so far from showing that all men have a common parentage, a common nature and destiny, it has declared that some are sons of God and some children of the Devil, that some are born with an elect destiny to good, and others with an elect destiny to evil.

Now the precise point that we here urge against "revealed" religion is that it divides and disintegrates mankind. And what we claim for natural religion is that it unites and fraternizes them.

"Revealed" religion deals with diversities of belief; natural religion deals with unities of belief. The one shows men wherein they differ; the other shows them wherein they agree. The one propounds dogmas, and urges authority; the other propounds ideas, and speaks of common sense. The one demands an unquestioning allegiance to certain truths; the other invokes an intelligent devotion to truth. The one works towards or on the surface of things, and ends in variety; the other digs for the deep-hidden, all-producing root, and ends in unity.

"Revealed" religion exercises its greatest power over men when their lives and habits are most artificial and conventional. When men are scheming and plotting each one for himself; when they are in the midst of every day's selfish pleasures, pursuits, and competitions; when they are farthest removed from the real sense of fraternity and the consciousness of generic humanity,—then, all the while, most likely, they are passively or actively believing in the doctrines of "revealed" religion, dwelling contentedly enough within the shadow or the pale of the Church, and sufficiently well aware that they are Presbyterians or Baptists or Methodists or Unitarians, or something else that ecclesiasticism approves. But let some event transpire in their midst that shakes them out of their ordinary individual selfishness, that awakens their common interest, rouses their common feelings of mercy, justice, indignation, hatred, that appeals, in short, deeply to their common nature,—and then we see them ceasing to stand apart and hastening together, looking frankly into one another's eyes and clasping cordially one another's hands; then we see them speedily jumping all their church barriers and coming together into one large place, forgetting their differences and remembering only their agreements; then we behold them under the sway of natural religion, and tending toward that broad plane of unsectarian and unpartisan brotherhood, whither it always leads.

The late civil war did much, for the time being, to emancipate this people from the disintegrating influence of church domination. The soldiers all fought under one flag, for one country and one cause; and one spirit of patriotism was in all their hearts. Under such circumstances it was difficult for one of them to remember that he was a Methodist, and that the man who marched by his side all day, slept by him in the trench all night, and fought with him all through the morrow's deadly fray, was a Universalist. But he did remember constantly that they were brothers in arms, and that both had vowed to live or die for one common fatherland. And so "revealed" religion faded out of their minds, and natural religion reigned there instead. It made the rank and file of the army a grand brotherhood, members all in the noble

Church of Humanity; and it sent the survivors home with a liberal religious education such as they had never received before.

In one of the largest printing establishments in New England, which gives employment to one hundred and thirty (more or less) men and women, and boys and girls, it has been our privilege to observe how easy it is for natural religion to flank "revealed" religion when they both come into the arena of real human interests, and how superior the former is to the latter in meeting real human wants. In that establishment we have seen collected almost every form of ecclesiasticism and non-ecclesiasticism, each one ordinarily quite self-asserting and proceeding to its own ends; and yet we have seen all these phases utterly disappear and give place to a whole-souled, large-minded liberalism, when some circumstance touched and tried all hearts in common. We have known some member of the office-family to be sick for weeks at a time, in penniless need and helpless invalidism; and then the others, on whom he had no claim but that of a common humanity, would come at the close of every pay-day to the foreman, or some other constituted receiver of donations, bringing from their scant earnings their generous tithes of kindness and pity for the poor unfortunate. From the proprietor down to the humblest and poorest, each would contribute what he or she could; and then when death was the end of sickness, work would be suspended, and Jew and Catholic, infidel and Calvinist, would go side by side to the funeral, listen to the simple, honest burial service, contributing flowers and hearty music, and then pass to the grave of one who, but for them, might have been homeless and friendless, a sufferer without kind care, a dying stranger without gentle consolation. Thus—

"One touch of Nature makes the whole world kin."

Natural religion will always assert itself when men themselves are natural and not artificial. "Revealed" religion, whatever else it brings to light, reveals not half so much of the innate nobleness of man, of the real Divine in the real human, as does natural religion. This last is sufficient, and needs no supplementing. Let us trust it, and be true to it, more and more.

DEFINITIONS OF RELIGION.

One of the best compliments I ever knew to be paid to a Free Religious Convention came from an Andover theological student, writing in the Springfield Republican. He complained that each of the speakers, on that occasion, seemed to have his own definition of the word "religion."

He did not assert that we quarrelled, that we found it impossible to understand each other, that we had no common ground on which to stand. On the contrary, he seemed to concede that we at least fancied ourselves to have some such common ground, and that we attained a reasonable amount of harmony in practice. But what business we with harmony or unity, when we did not all define "religion" just alike? This puzzled him.

Yet I observe that all other emotions are expected to vary with the individual who holds them,—to such an extent that no two could give absolutely the same definition of the feeling, if they told the precise truth. In a large family, all may love father and mother, yet no two love in the same way; a thousand delicate shades of confidence and fear, of utterance or reticence, of ideal and practical, will give for each a different type of emotion, even if there be no appreciable difference in quantity. Open a book of love-poems, and, among all the different bards who contribute to the collection, no two utter precisely the same feeling. If, now, there be this immense range of variation in the feeling inspired by a human and visible object, how much more with the profounder experience through which men recognize their dependence on the Unseen?

For one, I rejoice in Mr. Abbot's scholarly argument in favor of the derivation of the word "religion" from "relegere,"—meaning to read over, or investigate; and Cicero, from whom he obtains it, is undoubtedly far higher authority than Lactantius, from whom the Church obtains the common interpretation. And Mr. Abbot's own definition of religion has at least this merit, that it draws a wide line. When I described THE INDEX to an eminent English savant as "a religious paper," he testified some indifference; but when I added, "Mr. Abbot defines religion to be 'the effort of man to perfect himself,'" he at once became interested, and wished to see it. Such a definition expands our horizon instantly, sets our feet in a large place. Every brave and noble spirit who makes atheism into a religion (and there have been many such), is brought at once into sympathy with the rest of the brave and true; and is entitled to claim the word, if he wishes.

But, after all, the definition of a word is not all; and if we use this word for this purpose, it simply becomes necessary to use some other word for the sub-orders and varieties of religion. We must still have some word (like "piety," for instance, if that could be rescued from the taint of bigotry and conventionalism) to represent what to many of us is the essence of religion,—the soul's personal relation to the Deity. One temperament must not dogmatize for another temperament. We cannot even predict all the emotions of our own. Emerson says well: "Though in your philosophy you have denied all personally to God, yet when the devout emotions come, leave your theory, like Joseph his coat in the hands of the harlot, and flee." Certain it is that for many temperaments the thought of personal contact with a higher power (what Mr. Abbot describes as the "transcendental" attitude, and thinks inadequate) is a thing essential to them, which no science can displace. It is like the sense of free will, which no analysis can prove to be legitimate, I think; but which re-affirms itself on the faith of an instinct. When a difficult decision has to be made, we know that our will is free, and that the responsibility rests on ourselves. In the same way comes (to certain temperaments, at least) the instinct of personal dependence on God, and of a guidance,—not of course infallible, but of unspeakable worth and value,—leading to results of strength and peace far beyond what any mere philosophizing or scientific study could attain.

Our American locust or cicada, whose shrill cry seems to translate the intensest heat of summer into sound, is hatched from eggs in the boughs of trees. It finds itself a wingless grub, unable to fly, hardly able even to crawl, fitted only to burrow in the earth which it has never seen. Nature guides it; and the little cicada, crawling to the edge of the branch, drops itself into the air, that it may reach its destined home and there undergo, months and even years hence, a farther transformation. There are temperaments like this insect, so organized that when their time of need comes, they can trust themselves in an unknown element thus firmly. We must have words to describe them, and definitions of religion that do not omit them.

THE TRUE STORY.

As announced by a special "Notice" in the advertising columns this week, the four Directors of the Index Association whose action necessitated my retirement from the editorship of THE INDEX have legally transferred the one hundred and twenty-two shares of the capital stock of the Association owned or represented by them, amounting to $12,200 in all, to an early and tried friend of THE INDEX. This transfer, made in acceptance of propositions offered by himself, involves their own retirement from the Board of Directors and from the Association, and marks the final abandonment of the attempt by two of their number to control the paper in their own interest, which had evidently become hopeless. Mr. P. H. Bateson has also resigned his position as Business Manager, thus leaving the paper wholly in the hands of those who represent the original purposes for which the Association was formed.

In order to secure these most desirable results, the new owner has assumed the liability of all future assessments on these one hundred and twenty-two shares; and I earnestly hope (speaking wholly without his consent or knowledge) that other friends of the cause will step forward to emulate his great generosity by promptly relieving him of his disproportionate burden. All who wish now to help THE INDEX, so treacherously wounded in the house of its friends, can do so most effectually by subscribing at once for these and the remaining shares of the Association's stock. If this is done immediately, THE INDEX will go on more prosperously than ever; and no rebuke to the late attempted coup d'état could be so pointed or just as the prompt filling up of the $100,000 without the aid of those exaggerated "services" which are declared to be "indispensable."

With his characteristic spirit of self-sacrifice and faithful friendship, Mr. Stevens at once offered to resign his present post that I might be re-instated without delay by the Executive Committee. But I could not consent, after what has happened, to return to my former place in any way which should forestall the action of the stockholders,—least of all by my own vote as a member of the Committee. An open appeal has been made to them by both sides in this controversy, and I mean to abide by it. It is too late to recall this appeal, as the retiring Directors well know. They have sent out over their own signatures, not only to the stockholders, but also to the general public, gross falsifications of facts touching my official course, though I am willing to believe that they were subscribed by one or two of the signers with culpable heedlessness rather than with deliberate purpose to deceive; and these false charges against my course as business manager of the Association still stand unrecanted and unmodified. Although I shall take no notice of the puerile slanders of my private character mingled with these charges against my official action, it has become a duty (not at all affected by the retirement of the four Directors) to make the following condensed statement, full proofs of which will be presented at the June meeting of the stockholders.

1. Messrs. Bateson and Butts have had business interests in the Association wholly distinct from those of the other stockholders,—the one as printer, the other as paid agent and advertising contractor. Their private interests not harmonizing either with the financial or moral interests of the Association, I found it necessary to check them in many ways; and, although they had previously been bitterly hostile to each other, it is now made clear by recent events that they conspired together a few months ago to get the business management of the Association into their own hands, partly to gratify personal pique and ambition, but chiefly to conduct the business with a view to their own profit and advantage. This purpose, which was baffled so long as I remained business manager, was the immediate and real cause of all the recent troubles.

2. I wholly acquit Messrs. Bissell and Cone of all participation in this purpose; but they failed to penetrate the cunning policy carried out with their unsuspecting assistance by Messrs. Butts and Bateson, because they disregarded my repeatedly and urgently expressed wish for a thorough investigation, and suffered themselves to be duped by misrepresentations of my conduct which they should have seen through at once.

3. The financial resources of the Index Association were ample, in my opinion, to meet all the expenses of the year beginning March 1, 1873; and the pretence of a "deficit" was simply an artful contrivance invented by Messrs. Butts and Bateson for the purpose of alarming their associates in the Board of Directors, and thereby persuading them to terminate my business management, since this was an insuperable obstacle to the success of their own schemes. At the regular monthly meeting of the Directors on July 12, 1872, on motion of Mr. Butts, and by the majority vote of Messrs. Butts, Bissell, and Cone, Mr. Bateson had been relieved from the duties of Business Agent, for undue charges in his weekly printing and mailing bills, and for refusing in general to itemize the bills which he presented for payment to the Executive Committee. Yet, as the records show, it was Mr. Butts himself who nominated Mr. Bateson at the meeting of March 13, 1873, to succeed me as Business Manager; and it was Messrs. Butts, Bissell, and Cone who elected him.

4. Even conceding, however, that a dangerous deficit was to be feared, it should be attributed to the action of the Board itself at their meeting of August 8, 1872, when the appropriations were made for the present fiscal year. This action was based on Mr. Bateson's estimates of the cost of printing the enlarged INDEX as compared with the receipts from the subscription-list, and also on Mr. Butts' guarantee to the Board that he would himself subscribe for all shares of the capital stock not otherwise subscribed for by October 20, 1872. But Mr. Bateson's estimates proved to be fallacious; and Mr. Butts wrote to me from Boston on Oct. 2, 1872 (only four days after I had yielded to his urgent solicitation and through confidence in his honor had publicly announced the enlargement of the paper): "I MUST AND DO HEREBY WITHDRAW MY PROMISE TO TAKE ALL THE STOCK NOT TAKEN" [by Oct. 26]. The pretenses for this direct repudiation of his own word of honor, on which most important action by the Board and by myself had been based, were frivolous and childish in the extreme. Whatever financial embarrassment was to be anticipated on March 13 (and at the worst it was only temporary) should be honorably confessed to be due to mistaken action on August 8 by the Board itself, including all the four Directors except Mr. Bissell, who was absent; and their only mistake consisted in putting faith in Mr. Bateson's estimates and Mr. Butts' promises. The attempt to shift the responsibility of their collective action upon my business management, which was an essential part of the whole plot, is cowardly, malicious, and glaringly dishonest. I charge the anticipated embarrassment directly to Mr. Bateson's untrustworthy estimates and Mr. Butts' broken pledges; and I stand prepared to prove the charge.

5. The allegation that I have been willing to run the Association into debt is another of the misrepresentations by which it has been sought to break down my reputation and secure the transfer of the business control of the Association to Messrs. Bateson and Butts. If it is illegitimate to incur expenses to-day which are certainly covered by to-morrow's income, I am guilty of the charge; otherwise not. I will cheerfully leave this question to the decision of business men.

6. The reasons why I did not silently submit to the Board's action of March 13, and, withholding all knowledge of the facts from the readers of THE INDEX, wait till the Annual Meeting of the stockholders for redress, were briefly these. Before that time foolish steps would have been taken by the Board which could not be retraced, and delay was ruinous; no opportunity could have occurred for secretly informing the stockholders of the existing dangers to the paper, even if I had been willing to meet a plot by a counter-plot; the only hope of rescuing the paper was to rouse the public opinion which could alone save it; and, lastly, self-respect forbade me to submit even for a day to be used as a tool by designing men. I knew that it was a bad thing to let such a disgraceful controversy as this come to the general public; but I also knew that no lasting harm could accrue to the radical cause by the doings of any individuals, provided the radicals themselves were prompt with their reprobation. I have tried my best to avoid making to the general public even this brief statement, incomplete as it is; but the cunning misstatements signed by the four Directors have been scattered everywhere, and will work great injury to THE INDEX unless the most essential facts are truthfully told in these columns. I resigned my post because no honorable man could retain it; and I tell the story because no true friend of THE INDEX in my place could withhold it.

7. What I seek from the stockholders in June is simply that they then permanently entrust THE INDEX to as competent and faithful hands as those which now temporarily direct it. It has been too laboriously, expensively, and painfully built up, and is altogether too valuable to the radical cause, to be now either perverted or abandoned. All that I ask from them personally is to bear witness that I have been true to my trust hitherto; I do not ask to be restored as editor, and do not wish this if a better man can be found for the place. My own subscription to the stock is valid and binding in my eyes just so long as the paper is honestly kept to its proper work; and so long as that is the case, whether I am to edit it or not hereafter, I will do my best to support it in every possible way.

8. Rev. J. C. Learned, of St. Louis, has just published these weighty words: "We live in times when institutions, called by whatever name, are watched, and because they need it. Individual virtue is still sound. We see it in that very distrust of institutions, which latterly so tend to double-dealing and corruption. An increasing number of our best citizens stand aloof from party, from church, from all establishments and associations, from organized benevolence even, lest it be only another form of organized insincerity and fraud; so that the great practical problem of the present is how to purify institutions—how to put a soul and conscience into organizations." This has been my only crime, to strive to keep "a soul and conscience" in the Index Association; and the whole outcry against my conduct of its affairs has had its origin in a determination to get rid of all "soul and conscience" which stood in the way of private profits. In the cause of public morality I now invite and request the closest possible scrutiny of my business management, both as to its integrity and business wisdom, from the stockholders of the Association; I earnestly hope a committee of investigation will be appointed by them at the approaching Annual Meeting to report on this whole subject; and I demand that the rebuke of an indignant public shall fall with unrelenting severity on whatever party or parties shall be found to deserve it.

VOICES FROM THE INDEX CONSTITUENCY.

TO THE STOCKHOLDERS AND SUBSCRIBERS OF THE INDEX:—

Since last August I have been engaged in obtaining subscribers to THE INDEX, also to the stock fund of the Index Association. I have, during this time, acted through Mr. Butts, one of the Directors of the Index Association. When Mr. Butts first called to see me at Battle Creek, Michigan, last summer, he gave me distinctly to understand that he was doing work for THE INDEX without compensation; that he was giving his time free of charge, and to the great detriment of his business.

Under these impressions I engaged in THE INDEX work. I first went West to St. Paul, returning to Battle Creek. To the friends of THE INDEX, who sometimes asked me how Mr. Butts was connected with the paper, I replied by simply re-stating his own assertions. I thus misrepresented his actual business connection with the Association, but unwittingly. Soon after I returned from the West, Mr. Butts gave me to understand that he was receiving two per cent. on all stock subscriptions. Late in the fall, or in the early part of the winter, while in the East, he told me he was receiving five per cent. I then thought the Board had raised the commission from two to five per cent., the first being inadequate to pay expenses.

It was not until after the retirement of Mr. Abbot that I learned that Mr. Butts was receiving a commission of ten per cent. on the stock raised by him or his agents; and also that this commission of ten per cent. had been voted to him at a meeting of the Board about two weeks prior to the time when he first made an arrangement with me to work for THE INDEX.

When the copy of THE INDEX containing the "Valedictory" reached me, I was at Springfield, Ill. I went at once to the office at Toledo. Mr. Bateson (present business manager) showed me through the books of the Association. Mr. Butts gave me a full account of all the difficulties then existing. I met Mr. Bissell and Mr. Macomber, both Directors of the Association. I talked with Mr. Stevens and Mr. Abbot. After remaining at Toledo for eight days, and looking up this matter as thoroughly as I had any desire to do, I came to the following conclusions:—

1. That had Mr. Butts kept the pledge which he made to the Board last summer, and had Mr. Bateson at that time given reliable printing estimates to the Board, there would have been no cry of deficit in the current expenses of the year.

2. That Mr. Butts and Mr. Bateson are determined either to get the power into their own hands or ruin the Association—they now care little which; and for this purpose they make the most of a represented deficit in funds caused by their own faithlessness, thinking this will quickest win the stockholders, who do not personally know Mr. Abbot, to their side of this controversy. To this end they ask both proxies and assignments.

3. That it has been Mr. Abbot's persistence in adhering to the truest and highest methods in the conduct of THE INDEX, in opposition to questionable ones, which has stimulated this attack upon his character and business qualifications.

4. That I believe Mr. Abbot's methods and motives are entirely above suspicion or question—that he has only to be heard to secure our hearty sanction and support as stockholders.

Hoping that all who are interested in this question will give time and thought to it before deciding, I am

Yours truly,

W. P. WILSON.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich., April 15, 1873.

BOSTON, March 27, 1873.

MR. A. E. MACOMBER:

Dear Sir,—The small-potato rebellion in the Board of the Index Association took me by surprise, and made me feel pretty small myself. So Butts was paid a commission! That may have been earned, but why should he take pains to make me think that his labors were gratuitous, or nearly so? He certainly ought not to have charged or received any commission on my subscription to the stock, or on Mr. Sewall's; for, long before the stock scheme was started, I suggested the plan to him, in my office here, and told him I was ready to take stock,—and, when he called sometime afterward, I subscribed and Mr. Sewall subscribed, at my request. I stated to Butts, very distinctly, that my sole object in subscribing was to sustain Mr. Abbot in his noble position and all-important work. A Board of Railroad Directors would be very foolish to dictate to their civil engineer the materials and structure of a bridge. Why should our chosen and tried moral engineer be dictated to by such men as Cone, Butts, & Co.? My advice to these men is to subside instantly, with the best grace they can. They cannot control, probably, a share of stock save their own. I insist especially that the editor of THE INDEX shall have entire control of what shall be admitted into the advertising department. It is enough for the Board to regulate the prices. If there are any anti-Abbot stockholders who want to sell out, I think they can be accommodated at about par.

I shall authorize Col. Higginson to vote for me, if I find that I cannot attend in person.

Yours truly,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

BOSTON, April 7, 1873.

A. E. MACOMBER, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—You are quite at liberty to make any use of my letter [of March 27] you see fit, though it was written hastily and not intended for publication. Messrs. Cone, Butts, & Co. are also at liberty to show a similar letter I wrote them. Their own circular must convince any candid and sensible person that they are wholly wrong and Mr. Abbot in the right.

Yours truly,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

BOSTON, April 10, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

A word in response to Mr. Butts. I suppose that he is not himself "serious" in asking if I am. And not only am I serious in urging the transfer of THE INDEX to Mr. Abbot, but there is a general concurrence on the part of the friends of the journal this way,—all or nearly all hoping that such may be its fate.

As to the precise manner in which the Index Association can wind up its career and restore the paper to Mr. Abbot, it is not for me to speak. I had supposed, however, that the great majority of the subscribers to the stock never expected to get their money back again. They subscribed in that way because that was the manner in which the matter was presented to them. It was faith in Abbot that influenced them to act at all. Therefore I anticipate that they will cheerfully relinquish all claim to the property; and also that they will guarantee their full subscriptions to Mr. Abbot for the remainder of the term. Such is the disposition prevalent here. Of course those who oppose this plan should be compensated to the extent of their investments. Mr. Butts offers to take "less than fifty cents on a dollar." I doubt not that others who agree with him as to the management of THE INDEX will fall in with this example. Perhaps the sum required to satisfy their united claim will not be so formidable that it cannot be met, and Mr. Abbot still have funds sufficient to tide the paper over to the next year.

My experience in regard to "the success of journals which are conducted by one man" is that one man is as good as a dozen and better, give him funds to work with. I doubt not if Mr. Butts was intimately acquainted with "the history of The Radical," he would quite agree with me in this. With means at command, Mr. Abbot can hire his "business man," and there will be no chance for a conflict of authority. In such an arrangement I see peace, and as reasonable a chance for success as in the management of a board of officers, be they who they may.

In this connection, I wish to say that I am led to espouse Mr. Abbot's side from no mere personal feeling. Nor do I seek to make out a case against Mr. Butts. He has, I feel sure, worked hard, and from an interest in the spread of rational literature. He is not a stranger to me, and I speak from knowledge. Not from friendship or unfriendliness do I write, but out of a strong desire to see the right man in the right place—a place which I believe (in spite of all "figures" to the contrary) Mr. Abbot has created, and can fill at the present time better than any other man.

S. H. MORSE.

MADISON, Wis., March 27, 1873.

MANAGERS OF THE INDEX:

Gentlemen,—For the credit of Free Religion, and lest a worse fate befall THE INDEX than was ever dreamed of, let the ignoble difficulty as to its executive management be promptly submitted to wise and impartial arbitration. Demand, in your next issue, that every subscriber to the Association shall hasten to express himself or herself—yea or nay—as to the propriety of permitting Abbot (whom I do not know) to resume the editorial management on the original condition of general supervision of the paper. Each one of the subscribers to the stock should be entitled to as many votes, of course, as he holds shares of $100. If, as I confidently believe, the stockholders shall sustain the position adopted by Abbot (in view of the fact that it was mainly in response to his ardent appeals that they made their subscriptions, not expecting to receive in return any immediate pecuniary profit), reinstate the man in full authority. If his expenditures in the future shall be too profuse, rest assured that he himself will certainly be the greatest loser thereby, since his future must needs be so closely identified with the ultimate success of the journal that he must stand or fall with it. If, on the contrary, the stockholders (or a majority of them) sustain the action of the local Board of Directors, and insist upon their undoubted legal right of general supervision of the paper and control of its business management, let all and every one of the points in dispute between the Directors and Abbot be submitted to the stockholders themselves (who can easily signify their pleasure by letter or otherwise), and let Abbot, and those who agree with Mr. Butts, unite generously in accepting the decree of the majority.

Suppose Mr. Abbot to be permanently severed from THE INDEX, and that he succeeds in starting another and similar publication—I, for one, should support him in such an action, while much preferring the present organization should be preserved intact. While it is no doubt true that the cause cannot depend, in any great degree, upon the unassisted efforts of any individual, yet Abbot is next to certain of assistance; his eminent and conspicuous success heretofore demonstrates this fact. No mere hireling, no luke-warm editor, can ever effect the high purpose THE INDEX proposes: nascitur non fit is the supreme condition of success in the leadership of such an enterprise. Therefore, gentlemen, set an example of magnanimity worthy of the cause; do not imitate the petty feuds of the sectarians you have so fearlessly denounced, and thus bring contempt and derision upon those who are ready to pay all reasonable expenses.

A. WARREN KEISEY.

KENDALLVILLE, Ind., March 24, 1873.

TO THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:

Gentlemen,—In your last issue, I noticed with the most profound regret the compelled resignation of Mr. Francis E. Abbot, occasioned by what must seem (to all who love fairness) a most unwarrantable assumption of authority on the part of the Directors. Though I am no stockholder, I take the liberty to ask you if it would not have been an act of justice to your subscribers, before this decision had been made, to have given publicity to your intentions? As for my part, I look on the success of THE INDEX and the confidence the subscribers have in its continued existence, as due only to the corresponding confidence they had in the abilities and strong, unyielding principles of Mr. Francis E. Abbot.

I have always, since the commencement of your valuable paper, worked for its circulation; and I sincerely hope by the time you receive this you will have acknowledged your error and made such concessions as will have been necessary to secure to THE INDEX the valuable and efficient assistance of Mr. Abbot; as we all feel here that with him it is success; without him nothing.

Yours respectfully,

P. H. MAGNUS.

THE BIRTH OF CHEMISTRY.

When ancient learning had almost died out, and Europe was, intellectually, in a state of complete darkness, the Arabians were the most cultivated people in the world. It is to Arabia that we must look for the origin of several sciences which we are wont to attribute to other nations. The Arabians instituted universities, observatories, public libraries, and museums; they collected together all the remains of ancient learning, and through their medium the greater number of Greek and Latin authors which were read during the Middle Ages were known to Europe.

In the eighth century the Arabs had full possession of Spain, and at a somewhat later date this country possessed the most famous universities in Europe. The Arabs in propagating their new religion, propagated also the remains of ancient culture, which had already been introduced into Persia and Syria by the Nestorians, who had founded a school of great reputation at Odessa. Again, when Justinian closed the schools of Athens and Alexandria, many professors fled to Persia and Arabia, and formed new centers of learning. The works of many authors, including Aristotle, Dioscorides, and Pliny, were soon translated in Arabic and Persian, and became diffused.

In the eighth century the University of Bagdad was founded by the Caliph Al-Mansur, and in the following century it attained a pre-eminent position. A large medical school was connected with it, also hospitals and laboratories. The Caliph Al-Mamoun created an observatory in Bagdad, and an attempt was made to measure the arc of the meridian. It is said that at one time the University of Bagdad possessed more than six thousand students. In the sciences found a home, and every scrap of ancient learning was eagerly collected and often extended. When the Arabic Empire was broken up by internal dissensions into a number of small States, the University of Bagdad, losing the powerful patronage of the Caliphs, fell into decay, and soon ceased to be known. A celebrated school arose in Cairo in the tenth century, but we possess but few particulars concerning it.

We soon hear of Spain as a focus of learning. In the tenth century this was the most flourishing country in Europe, both intellectually and otherwise. The University at Cordova possessed great celebrity, and students flocked to it from all parts of the world. It contained a library of between 200,000 and 300,000 volumes, an unusually large collection of books prior to the invention of printing. The Arabians were great mathematicians and astronomers. Lalande places Mohammed-ben-Glaber (better known as Albategnius) among the twenty greatest astronomers who have ever lived. Again, Alhazen wrote a treatise on optics in the eleventh century, and there were many treatises on optics and medicine. The Arabs made but little advance in anatomy, however, because they were forbidden by the Koran to mutilate the human body.

After the above remarks it is almost needless to say that we must look to Arabia for the earliest treatises on alchemy and chemistry. Indeed, the Arabians cultivate the latter science without success, and the first work on the subject, with which we are acquainted, was written by Jaber Abou-Moussah-Djafer-al-Sofi, whom we call Geber, an Arab of the eighth century.—Nature.

When a little son of the famous tragedienne Rachel lay sick unto death, the father of the child sent a priest to beg him to permit that he be baptized into the church. Rachel, clinging to her grand old Hebrew ideals, refused again and again to yield. He should be no slave to blind superstition and all the mental ransy included in the act.

"Thank heaven," she exclaimed passionately, "he is my child. No husband can give me rights from me. If I were a Jew now, the law would permit the father to snatch him from my arms and torture in any way he pleased. But I am a Christian. Leave me with my child," she commanded the priest as she bent over with the tenderest affection.

"The custom of throwing rice after a bride is Chinese." The custom of throwing the poker or bootjack after her, is one of our Christian observances in America.

The readers of the Times will remember the recent published letter of "A Sorrowful Mother," in which she asked: "What am I to do? My little two-year-old darling is baptized Schuyler Colfax Pomeroy Horton. Was ever a child so afflicted; and what can we do?" The Hartford Courant has read the touching inquiry and responds: "Let him be 'born again.'"—Chicago Times.

Many years ago, when ministers had but little stated salary, and depended largely upon gifts, or personal donations of money or provisions from their parish, for the support of their families, a country clergyman always wound up his pastoral visits on those members of his parish who had not been mindful of their duty in regard to their gifts, with this little speech: "Now, my good friends, I did not come a-beggin'; but if you've got anything to give me, I've brought a bag to put it in."—The Christian Era.

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

AND

Christian Spiritualist.

BEING A SYNOPSIS OF THE INVESTIGATION OF SPIRIT INTERCOURSE BY AN EPISCOPAL BISHOP, THREE MINISTERS, FIVE DOCTORS AND OTHERS AT MEMPHIS, TENN., IN 1855; ALSO, THE OPINION OF MANY EMINENT DIVINES, LIVING AND DEAD, ON THE SUBJECT, AND COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED FROM A NUMBER OF PERSONS RECENTLY.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON
OF THE

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

MODERN THINKER--NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ere this have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all booksellers know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give utterance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

The Old God and the New Humanity.....	1
A Danger to Civilization.....	19
Stewart-Astor-Vanderbilt—Letters addressed to three Millionaires on the Social Function of Wealth.....	30

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS, PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

[From the Westminster Review.]

Modern Scepticism.—Faith and Free Thought.

These reflections have been forced upon us on receiving the second series of lectures delivered under the auspices of the "Christian Evidence Society." This Society was founded nearly two years ago, "for the purpose of meeting doubts among the educated classes." It numbers among its lecturers an Archbishop and three or more Bishops, besides Deans, Professors of Divinity and Hebrew, Canons, a few eminent Non-conformist preachers, and other notabilities. Its list of patrons and chairmen includes such names as those of the Marquis of Salisbury; Lord Shaftesbury, Harrowby, and Cairns; Mr. Samuel Morley, M. P., and Mr. Stevenson, M. P. With such a "cast" as this, success of a certain sort was assured. The religious papers inform us that the meetings have been crowded, and the first series has gone through no less than six editions. Whether the meetings have been mainly attended, and the published lectures purchased, by the class of doubters for whose benefit the Association was devised, or by Orthodox persons anxious to assist at a demonstration of their own wisdom and the ignorance and blindness of their opponents, is a point on which certainly we cannot, nor perhaps can the leaders of the movement, form an opinion. Judging from analogy, we should expect the latter to be the case. We should expect a series of meetings convened against the liquor trade to be attended principally by permissive men, and gatherings convened against the Permissive Bill to be made up, for the most part, of licensed victuallers and their friends. Or to choose an illustration still more apposite, we should suppose (what is indeed the fact) that lectures against Christianity would be attended for the most part by infidels; nor should we expect that, except under some exceptional circumstances, such a course of lectures would have any very decided effect on the body of the Orthodox. At any rate, the Society may be congratulated on numbering among its supporters donors of such a munificent sum as a thousand guineas, and we should not be surprised to hear of other like sums being given, and of the lectures becoming, for some time at least, an annual institution. What we think the promoters may still more strongly be congratulated upon, is the tone adopted in these addresses. They are the productions of cultivated men, who may perhaps in some instances have felt the doubts which they seek to combat, who are at any rate aware that there are difficulties in the way of belief quite beyond the intellectual grasp of such divines as Dr. Cumming and Mr. Spurgeon, and we may add of the bulk of preachers, Anglican and Dissenting, and that such difficulties are not to be immediately solved by an exhibition of hell-fire. "I have some knowledge," says Dr. Rigg, the President of the Westminster Training College, and an ornament of the Wesleyan body, "of the difficulties of thought and belief which may lead honest men to become pantheists; I understand the manner of thought of one who has become entangled in the mazy coil of pantheistic reasonings: at all events I know that honest searchers after truth may reluctantly become intellectual pantheists, while yet their heart longs to retain faith and worship towards a personal God." This excellent spirit marks the whole of the two volumes before us.

It is not our intention to review these lectures. It would be impossible, in our brief limits, to review twenty-two independent productions. If we were in a situation to notice them in detail, we think we could show that there is not one of them that is not open to serious objections from the other side. Take a specimen or two, culled at random on opening the pages of these volumes. Professor Rawlinson, in some six-and-thirty small octavo pages, widely printed, disposes of the "Alleged Historical Difficulties of the Old and New Testaments." Of these the Story of the Exodus occupies just six and a half. Does the Professor really believe that the elaborate arguments of Bishop Colenso and others are to be met in this way? To be sure, the time at his disposal would not have allowed him to go thoroughly into the matter; but ought not that consideration to have pointed to the advisability of choosing some other subject, or, at least, of selecting some one difficulty, and dealing with that in a manner which should be satisfactory? As it is, the Professor's "short method" with those who believe that the story of the Exodus has a historic foundation, but is not necessarily inspired in all its details, is amusing and characteristic. The numbers of the sacred text, he says, are exactly the part of it which is most liable to corruption and least to be depended upon. Six hundred thousand may mean sixty thousand, and so on. "Cavils as to their exact numbers, or as to the particular expressions used in Exodus, do not touch the main fact, but show (if they show anything) either that our ancient manuscripts are here and there defective, or that an early Oriental historian does not write in the exact and accurate style of a nineteenth century Occidental critic!" This, we take it, is virtually a concession of all that Bishop Colenso and the "educated sceptic" contend for; for once admit that an historian does not write "in an exact and accurate style," and we are entitled to make any deductions whose common sense may require from his narrative. Theologians have certainly the merit which Napoleon assigned to British soldiers: they do not know when they are beaten. In a similar off-hand way, Mr. Gladstone disposes of the scientific difficulties of the Bible, in about the same number of pages. We wish we could notice this curious production, every page of which must excite a smile in any one who has seriously considered the questions thus raised. We will give one example. Mr. Gladstone, like Hugh Miller, Archdeacon Pratt, and others, quietly assume a partial deluge, which, indeed, the discoveries of science have forced upon him, utterly ignoring the fact that if there be one statement plainly and unmistakeably set forth in Scripture, from the first of Genesis to the last chapter of Revelation, it is that of a universal deluge. "Every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth." "All flesh died that moved upon the earth." "I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth, both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air." "All the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered." No ingenuity can get over these plain statements. What will the educated sceptic say when he sees them evaded in this lecture for the hundredth time? Again, mark the disingenuity of what follows. We beg pardon, however: we do not believe that there is any conscious disingenuity on the part of the writer—we believe him to be entirely ignorant of any difficulty in his way.

"We are so accustomed," writes the Bishop of Carlisle, "to the first chapter of Genesis, that I think we sometimes scarcely perceive its peculiarities; but suppose that the reverse order of arrangements had been adopted, and that man, in deference to his dignity, had been represented as coming in first, and that other creatures had been represented as being made afterwards for his use and pleasure—would not this have made a radical change, and introduced an enormous scientific difficulty?"

But this order of creation—viz., man first and other creatures afterwards—is precisely that which is given, not indeed in the first, but in the second chapter of Genesis. In verse seven man is formed; in verse nine trees are made to grow, pleasant to the sight and good for food; in verse eighteen God determines to make an helpmeet for man, and in verse nineteen proceeds to form animals, but as none of these is found an helpmeet for him, woman is created in verses twenty-one and twenty-two. The divergence between these two narratives is accounted for by a discovery as clearly established as any in the whole domain of criticism: they are, as is well known, the productions of two different writers, known as the Elohist and the Jehovist. But that is not the point here; the point is that the Bishop should quietly assume the absence from the Bible of what he admits would be "an enormous difficulty," when precisely this same difficulty in an aggravated form stares him in the face a few verses further on. Here, again, what will the intelligent sceptic say? Or, take the following by Mr. Row: "All experience proves that mythic and legendary miracles are grotesque. Yet those in the Gospels are all sober ones, and stamped with a high moral tone." What, we may confidently ask Mr. Row, would he have said to the miracle of turning water into wine at Cana, if he had met with it out of the Gospels? Evidently that it was not sober (we mean no pun), that it was grotesque and clearly apocryphal, that it accomplished no moral purpose, except indeed the exhibition of superhuman power, which, if it be admitted as a sufficient moral end, lets in all miracles of whatever kind. We have noted in reading over these volumes a number of passages similar to the above; but, as we have already said, our object not being to review them, we must leave these, together with an estimate of each contribution, taken as a whole, to such as may have the inclination and the power to enter upon the task.

Our object is a different one. It is to point out ground which we think ought to be taken up, and objections which, if possible, ought to be met by lectures in what we may take it for granted will be a fresh series to be delivered in the ensuing season. We shall make no apology for using the plainest language. The aim of the Society is to remove difficulties in the way of belief, and they ought to be thankful to any one who points out to them without subterfuge what those difficulties really are.

We see it very generally stated by Orthodox writers in and out of these volumes, that there is no logical resting-place for the mind between a belief in Revelation on the one hand and atheism or pantheism on the other. "Deism," writes Dr. Rigg, "grants too much to the Christian." And what he calls "the via media of deism," has been ridiculed by an able writer, Mr. Henry Rogers, in his popular work, "The Eclipse of Faith." Granting for the sake of argument that this is so, though we by no means admit the fact, the inference sought to be drawn is obvious. There being no other choice open to us but a "heart-withering negation," a system which denies, or at least ignores, the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul, and the glorious and inspiring promises of Revelation, is it not clearly to the interest of everybody that the latter system should prove true?

The philosopher will not be very much struck with an argument in favor of a theological creed which is founded on people's supposed interests. But, accepting this ground, we unhesitatingly reply (while begging on our own account to repudiate all sympathy with atheistical or pantheistical views) that it would be greatly to the general interests that atheism should prove to be true, rather than that the theological system preached among us should prove to be true. And we consider this to be not a mere statement of opinion, but one capable of the most rigid demonstration.

For, what does Revelation teach us? That we are lost, degraded, ruined creatures, born into the world and living in the world under a divine curse. As the grave is the ultimate receptacle destined for the human body, so a place of endless and unspeakable torment is the natural receptacle destined for the human soul. We are not disputing the truth of this dogma. What we affirm, however, is that, if it be indeed true, then the wildest imaginings of the most savage creeds are as sunlight compared with the horrors of our actual situation. Yet a gleam of light (it is but a gleam) is suffered to penetrate to this our dreary prison, in which we are penned up like so many cattle waiting for the shambles. In virtue of a mysterious transaction, to which we need not further allude, a certain number of persons will be "saved;" that is to say, will not only be rescued from the general fate, but will exchange it for a condition of endless happiness. Scripture, we think, lays it down very clearly that the number of the saved will be small, and to the same effect is the preaching current among ourselves; yet we will waive this point and concede that it may be very large. Still, the fact remains that a very considerable number of us are destined by the Creator of theologians to a fate at which imagination stands aghast. And then we are quietly told that we have an immense interest in the existence of such a Creator being proved, or, however, rendered highly probable; and that if an opposite conclusion could be arrived at, it should be promulgated only as "the utterance of an agonized heart, unable to suppress the language of its misery!"

We should like, then, this subject to be handled by one of the lecturers in the coming series. We should like him to try and show that the balance of advantage to the human race would be in favor of his system, according to which say x persons are to be made endlessly happy and y eternally miserable, as against one which leaves the fate of x plus y altogether uncertain, the most probable inference being that they would all fall into the peaceful and painless sleep of death. We should also like him to try and show us that a person who was himself conscious of being selected for future happiness, ought not as a philanthropist to hope that the latter system might be the true one. And if any gentleman should condescend to act upon our suggestion, we must really be excused if after a perusal of these volumes and some slight acquaintance with the works of theologians, we ask him to be so good as to stick to his point. It will not do to tell us that every one is offered a chance of going to heaven, and that it will be his own fault if he goes to hell. This really does not touch the question. The fact, as we are told, is that a great number of persons will be sent to hell; and from whatever cause this may arise, whether from their own fault or not, we say we hope it is not true—in other words, that a system which teaches it as a fact is not true. We are quite sure that universal oblivion is a much brighter prospect for the race than this. We are inclined to exclaim with Pliny: "Que (maum) ista dementia est, literari vitam credere? Perdit profecto ista dulcedo, crediturque praeceptum naturae bonum, mortem; ac duplicat obitum, si dolere etiam post futuri aestimatione evenit." [Hist. Nat., vii. 55.] Again, we shall not be satisfied by the lecturer pointing out that Christianity has always borne the title of "good tidings." To be sure it has, and rightly, too, on the supposition that without it we were all doomed to endless perdition. But then this statement, for which no shadow of foundation can be deduced from any other source, is part of the system of Revelation, and stands or falls with it.

Far in the depths of yonder heavens there may be, there probably are, worlds in existence beharing on their surface intelligent beings. Judging from analogy, we are led to suppose that such beings, if they exist, undergo a process resembling death. Who, if he casts his thoughts in that direction, will not indulge in the hope that with them death means sleep for all, rather than the waking of some to endless happiness and others to endless misery? We are not aware that there would be anything impious, even in the view of theologians, in the indulgence of such a hope, provided it were carefully confined to regions many millions of miles away from the earth. Yet who does not see that the expression of it is an immediate reductio ad absurdum of the consoling and inspiring character which they claim for their Revelation?

This consideration does not indeed touch the truth or falsehood of Revelation. It may be very bad news indeed, and yet be perfectly true. Still, we are in favor of things bearing their right names, and we altogether object to the term "good tidings" being applied to this system as a whole. Moreover, that theologians have never chosen to consider (for we will not charge them with wilfully misrepresenting) the character of their creed, is to us a singular and suggestive circumstance. And although, as we said before, people ought not to found their belief on their interests, yet such is the weakness of humanity that they will often do so; and it is at any rate better to base one's belief upon a true than a false view of one's interest. Now, it is not for the advantage of mankind that the Scriptures should turn out to be literally inspired, for they teach that the greater part of mankind will be damned everlastingly. And it is certainly not to the advantage of mankind generally, that the greater part of them should be damned everlastingly.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XIX.

INVOLVES A MEETING AND A DEPARTURE.

When Paul Gower obtained an answer to his letter to Harry Franklin, it afforded him but little satisfaction. The young farmer's epistle was twice as long as his friend's, proportionately sentimental, and contained his own poetical adieu to England and the desired news of Kate; but the latter merely confirmed what her lover had heard already, with such additional particulars as greatly increased his distrust of effecting a reconciliation. Yet nothing had happened but what might have been anticipated from her recent bias and present position.

Beginning with the usual formula that she was very much changed, Harry proceeded to relate how, upon the return of his stepmother and Mr. Pennethorne from Warwickshire (in a state of peculiar complacency, since they had succeeded in diverting their now deceased relative's testamentary intentions from his mistress and housekeeper to themselves; and also driven that wicked woman out of doors, to end her sinful days in the work-house), Kate's spiritual condition had strongly recommended her to their notice, and induced an intimacy between the three which was not only in flagrant contradiction to Miss Sabin's former dislike to the successor of her aunt, but had rendered her more of a devotee than ever. Instead of going to church on Sundays with her cousins, Kate preferred accompanying Mrs. Franklin to the village chapel, and had more than once walked over to — with her, on Wednesday afternoons, for the purpose of hearing some uncompromising Presbyterian doctrine, at a conventicle of that persuasion ordinarily frequented by Mr. Pennethorne, who treated the ladies to tea afterwards and brought them home in his sociable. He seemed, said Harry, a little smitten by Kate, at which Esther laughed, declaring that her cousin was quite welcome to him; though, to do her justice, she gave him no encouragement. She respected his character, Miss Sabin said, and had learned to appreciate that of his mother, regarding them as persons who had set their affections on things not of this world, and were greatly in advance of herself in religious experience—upon which Harry launched out into various ironical and uncomplimentary remarks on the subjects of her eulogium; adding that he should never have thought it possible that she should be so easily deceived. (Nothing, however, is more common than this kind of self-stultification, both in judgment and in conduct; for most people have been so sedulously perverted as to the nature of genuine piety that they involuntarily identify it with adherence to a certain set of theological opinions, no matter how barren and even mischievous the result—in a word, ignore practice in favor of profession. Neither is discrimination of character at all an ordinary quality, but few persons possessing sufficient penetration to distinguish the similitude from the reality. Like most of us, Kate only regarded others from her own particular point of view; and if they suited her for the time being, pronounced in their favor.) She now championed the writer went on to say, his stepmother against both himself and Esther, and would not hear a word in opposition—backing, so to speak, her own notions against all fact whatever. Once, when his sister had remarked that it was a pity that professedly religious people didn't show more of it in their lives, and endeavor to restrain their tempers and selfish ways, Kate turned quite cross and answered that perhaps they couldn't help it—we ought to forgive and be sorry for them. In short, according to Harry Franklin's representations, his cousin was making rapid progress in her new direction, and bade fair to become as fervent a zealot as she had been a coquette—by no means an unnatural transition, involving, in fact, only a transfer of the principle of self-seeking from one object to another.

Rather dismayed at this intelligence, Paul resolved to await the return of his mistress to town before adopting other proceedings. His chief confidant and consoler at this period was poor Mills, who brought him news of whatever transpired in Newman Street, listened with wonderful patience to the story of his hopes, fears, misgivings, and aspirations, and cheered him with his simple belief that he and Miss Sabin would yet come together, in spite of all obstacles and hindrances. In the poor drawing-master this conviction amounted to faith. He had fairly divided his allegiance between Kate and her lover, entertaining towards them an almost canine loyalty. He thought her the most beautiful, the most amiable, and the most accomplished of her sex—the culminating perfection of a family which in his eyes embodied all that was estimable—while Paul he regarded as worthy of such a paragon. No discrepancy of conduct on the part of the young lady or her kinsfolk, and still less any personal considerations, could alter the opinions of this artless optimist, even when suffering from the talons of "the kitten" or the severer practical jokes of Frank, who had been known to pour "turps" into his hat; to ornament his trousers with stripes of white paint; to fasten his coat-tails to the chair whereon he sat, by means of cobbler's wax, thereby effecting their sudden and most superfluous laceration—even these playful familiarities only provoked the mildest remonstrances. Mills would attribute them to that exuberance of animal spirits which is natural to youths of vivacious disposition, remarking that very celebrated men of all kinds had exhibited similar juvenile characteristics. And as Kate had seldom tried his patience beyond calling him "an old stupid," or "moke," or "humguffin," or the like appellations, while Paul always treated him with a show of regard and civility which contrasted notably with the free-and-easy disrespect of others, the poor fellow's gratitude to and liking for both were quite extraordinary.

Mills had originally drifted into his position in the house of Sabin by virtue of that curious law which seems to provide all shifty and unprovided people with hangers-on and dependants. There were rumors of his original respectability, nay, affluence; it was asserted that he had received a classical education, and begun life as a lawyer, even appearing in court. "Fancy Mills in a wig," Kate used to say, laughing; and Frank and the young artists who frequented the house had caricatured him in all sorts of forensic caxons, from a Lord Chancellor's downwards. It was at this traditional period that he had become acquainted with John Sabin, Solicitor, to whom and to "the great John Mills," his brother—who had professional dealings with Sabin senior—was indiscriminately attributed his introduction to Newman Street. Taking up with his present nominal calling by the advice of the two latter, Mills had adhered to the family forthwith. His only surviving relatives were a couple of ancient spinster sisters, who dwelt at Stoke Pogis (which always sounded funny in such a connection), were reported to be very well off and ashamed of him, and therefore regarded by the Sabins as monsters of pride and insensibility.

To say that Mills never ventured to put himself on an equality with Paul were superfluous, for he was incapable of such an assumption towards anybody, dropping naturally into the position of humble friend and retainer, and possessing a spontaneous aptitude for playing second fiddle on all occasions. There were other points of sympathy between them besides their mutual admiration of Kate Sabin. Paul, as has been observed, loved reading; and of poor Mills' classical education he had only retained one characteristic, a predilection for books, though rather of amusement than instruction and especially Spanish romance—those delightful fictions which served at once as model and inspiration to our early English novelists; and which the immortal knight of La Mancha and the vivacious son of the gentleman-usher of Santillane have made famous throughout the world. Sharing this taste, the pair never tired of talking of the heroes in question; of Guzman d'Alfarache, Lazarillo de Tormes, Paul the Spanish Sharper, and others of the same irresistible quality; and Mills would chuckle with glee at the repetition of favorite passages, of which Paul knew an extraordinary quantity by heart. Indeed, Spain was to both of them the land of romance and adventure par excellence, an inexhaustible topic of interest and entertainment; and so far did the drawing-master carry his enthusiasm respecting it, that he sometimes declared, quite oddly, that he saw no reason why, hereafter, he and Paul shouldn't visit that wonderful country together, and travel in the identical track of Don Quixote. Poor Mills!—when to all who heard his terribly consumptive cough, it was painfully evident that his journeys would be limited to the prosaic London streets, in which he daily wore out the soles of the old boots inherited from his patron, John Sabin. Traversing those same streets years afterwards, when he had become familiar with those of strange cities, thousands of miles away, Paul recalled these conversations, and found them additionally lonesome for the lack of his poor friend, Robert Mills.

But, however well-disposed towards him, Mills could not at present afford him much assistance in the matter nearest his heart; and it so perversely happened that, before Kate's return home, the drawing-master had contrived to render himself temporarily unavailable even for the offices of confidant and messenger. The cause involves a little detail of another of his idiosyncracies.

In all business affairs, Mills was one of the stupidest of mortals. Having none of his own (to speak of), this would have mattered very little, only he was sometimes indiscreetly trusted with the concerns of others, when, so sure as he undertook any beyond the very simplest responsibility, he inevitably made a mess of it. The Sabins knew but occasionally forgot this, to the production of certain confusion on both sides. Commonly they gave him the exact sum when they sent him out to buy anything, or the precise words of a message; but there did occur exceptional cases of confidence and miscarriage. Thus it was on record that Mills, delegated to collect money from a debtor of dubious credit, and not finding him at home, had left the receipted bill as a reminder. That he had allowed an important customer, inquiring after a picture especially commended to Sabin senior for careful restoration, to penetrate to the studio, where the said picture—a portrait of the customer's deceased grandfather—was discovered ornamented with horns, wings, and a tail, in chalk, by Frank; and had even authorized the opening of a note from the old painter to his eldest son by that gentleman's mother-in-law, whereby the Thornton family became acquainted with the ignominious fact that the writer was in urgent need of the sum of one pound, two shillings and sixpence, to pay a water-rate and prevent the untimely cutting off of that indispensable fluid from the Newman Street household. All these blunders, and more, poor Mills was undeniably guilty of; and the worst of them generally resulted in his temporary, self-imposed absence from the beloved domicile. He would stay away at his lodgings until very nearly starved, when he was usually fetched back by Kate, or Frank, or Tib, or a deputation of all three together, his error condoned, and himself received into his accustomed position in the family; until some new one drove him again from his ark into the wilderness of this world, again to be reclaimed and forgiven.

Now such a stupidity (in fact the pawing of the watch of John Sabin, senior, at the instigation of Arthur, his son, the black sheep of the family, who made a cat's-paw of Mills, by fraudulently representing that the old man wanted it done, but didn't like to propose it, and then went and spent the money in gin) occurred to banish Paul's friend from Newman Street, just before Kate's return from Northamptonshire. Likewise he changed his lodgings without communicating with the young man or leaving any intelligible address, while his drawing-lessons in Soho Square had recently terminated. He also kept out of the way of everybody. So Paul, ascertaining the fact of Kate's arrival from Richard Sabin—who neither cared to volunteer the news nor to conceal it—found himself totally deprived of the assistance of his all but indispensable auxiliary. And it was now the first week in February, while he expected to embark for the United States in March.

Rendered desperate, he resorted to an artful expedient. As if in ignorance of what had happened, he addressed to Mills, at Newman Street, a letter of a most gloomy, not to say alarming, character, in which, under the pretext of requesting him to meet him next evening in the immediate vicinity, he drew such an incidental picture of his own mental condition as could hardly be contemplated unmoved by the real recipient, whom it is needless to say was Kate Sabin. He would not, he stated, seek to change her decision, nor make any further appeal against a resolution which must inevitably embitter the remainder of his existence, if it did not materially shorten it. He intended to bid an eternal adieu to his native land almost immediately, feeling that whatever befel him was, to her, a matter of perfect indifference. He would not allude to the past, nor insinuate that the reason she had assigned for discarding him might not be the true one, which was in all probability identified with some new admirer, with whom he hoped she might be happy. All he asked was a parting interview. Why he wrote to Mills to solicit this, instead of Kate herself, and why he chose to conceal his real hopes even from himself, under a morbid affection of despair, involves one of those instances of ingenious folly which are common enough at one-and-twenty. Having despatched this letter, he, with a palpitating heart, kept the one-sided appointment.

As he secretly hoped, so it proved. After waiting some time with a miserable recollection of happier assignations, who should appear but Kate herself. She had opened the note, as intended, and, touched by its contents, responded personally.

He drew her arm through his, and they walked on together. Flattering with emotion at sight of the face which had been—which was—so dear to him, and at the sadness perceptible in it, he strove to express how passionately he had longed to see her again. "I thought you would come, Kate," he concluded. "Thank God, I am not disappointed?"

THE PILGRIM AND THE SHRINE; or, Passages from the life and correspondence of Herbert Aluslie, B. A., late a student of the Church of England. G. P. PUTNAM & SONS. New York: 1871.

This remarkable book was written more than twelve years since, but was not published in London until 1868, nor re-published in America until 1871. But it is only more timely for the lapse of these years, because it is one of the most thoroughly and wisely radical of all the works which the rationalistic spirit has yet produced, and a book which will be increasingly read for years to come. The story of travel and adventure which runs through the volume, and the passage of love which concludes it, are in no way remarkable; but they are pleasant enough, and they make a natural setting for those parts of the work which are really significant, the long passages of admirable radical thinking, in which topic after topic of religious faith receives most clever and most conclusive handling. Upon the whole, we think it may be said that no radical writer has more judiciously and effectively re-worked the ground of religion, with especial reference to both wings of radicalism—that which goes "outside of Christianity" and leans towards the materialism of positive science, and that which gives a new meaning to Christianity and makes it identical with rational humanity and natural religion. In many of his thoughts, the author of "The Pilgrim and the Shrine" gets into the company of the positive and untheological radicals, while in many others he shows that he understands clearly the view taken by radicals to whom a modified Christianity is still important. And the charm and power of all the statements lie especially in this, that they reflect the actual working of a fully emancipated and highly cultivated mind, and are as free as a perfect mirror from any stain of interest or motive, or any passion whatever. The writer evidently kept notes of an actual experience, and set down his thoughts as the unfolding of his inward life produced them. Starting with a good mind, and a thorough education, he had become a fearless and profound thinker, when he went abroad into the freedom of remote parts of the world—California in the first gold-digging days, and then Australia—and apart from all restraints of circumstance and custom, and favored by the influences of a state of things based on absolute liberty, thought himself out thoroughly, and at last found, in a woman worthy of his love, and in a home established upon noble and happy mutual affection, the shrine of a religion of pure and perfect love.

The pilgrimage of the author of this remarkable book was from Orthodoxy of the strictest Evangelical sort, and from theological study and candidacy for the clerical office, and a home absolutely shut in by strict Orthodox influences, out into the virgin world of California and Australia, and the unhampered pursuit of free thought, and the adoption of faith and philosophy which raised purity of heart, shown in loving one another, to the rank of true religion; and made the sole essential of Christianity, and indeed of any historical religion, to consist in its teaching of that righteousness and kindness and self-sacrifice which Nature blends into one deep life of the soul when we truly "love one another" and build up the whole of life under the influences of noble self-devotion. From God in dogmas to the divine in Nature and natural human relations, was the progress of this pilgrim who here tells his story. It is the true pilgrim's progress of modern reverence for ideal truth. If we could have a Bunyan in this day of science and thought, equal to representing under the types of imagination the journey from the bad to the good, he would make dogma in religion and depravity in character the two gates of the soul's destruction, and purity of soul and a happy home he would represent as the goal of the journey, the recovery of Paradise. Depravity is the undisguised bane of man's condition; dogma is the bad clothed in light, the worst enemy man ever had, worse than open and hateful badness, because it is essentially self, conceit disguised as conscience, pushing pride under a cover of piety, assertion and pretension substituted for performance and action,—the Old Nick of our nature in place of the simple and honest best of that nature. The truth of the Hebrew text about the heart of man being deceitful above all things and desperately wicked is shown in the history of dogmas made as gods, and self and selfishness sheltered by structures of dogma, and manifold and monstrous sin done in the name of dogma, more than in all other bad workings of human nature put together. The crimes of Christendom have exceeded in malignity and horror all other crimes of the race. The body of Christians has of course always contained a proportion of natural human souls, and of late it has grown preponderantly natural and humane; so that now it is difficult to realize the truth of Mr. Beecher's assertion that for a thousand years the administration of the organized religion of Jesus was more worthy of devils than of men, was in fact simply and utterly "infernal," as he says; but the honest scholar, once that he tests Christian history by the rule of humanity, is compelled to see that nothing more atrociously and inexcusably bad was ever done on earth than so-called Christian sacrifices of men's lives and happiness and interests to the supposed claims of Christian dogma. No idea ever put in vogue among men has had more of the poison of destruction in it than the idea of total depravity, which denies that man is by nature the son of God. The assertion of this, and of the constant and infinite wrath of God against man, has held down the race and obstructed progress in its sources, and brutally murdered untold numbers of innocents, by cutting off from their birth and infancy the saving power of hope and faith and love, in a way and to an extent without a parallel in the history of heathenish degradation. It lies on the surface of history that no sword has so cruelly drunk human blood as the sword drawn in the name of Christ; and to this external fact corresponds a vaster and more infamous action of malignant influences under the surface of history, the universal poisoning of maternal sentiment and paralyzing of parental influence by those worst lies ever told on earth—the lie against human nature and the lie against God's perfect fatherhood. Hence it is from false dogma to the shrine of natural domestic love, that the pilgrim guided by truth will inevitably journey.

The Jewish Times discourses editorially upon a congenial topic—to wit, "The Jews." We learn from the Times that the Jews proclaim now, as they did in ages gone by, the sacredness of the pursuits of science, the authority of reason and the dignity of man as a being come forth from the hands of the Creator pure and undefiled. They are as much as ever a peculiar people in that sense, and no doubt will have to carry on the contest many a century yet before prejudice will have given way to reason; authority-belief to intellectual worship; the Church to the religion of the heart, the divine jewel common to all.—N. An ignorant lecturer explained the passage of the Red Sea by saying that the Israelites crossed on the ice. "There is no ice under the equator!" exclaimed an auditor. "Ladies and gentlemen," retorted the lecturer, "the event to which I refer happened thousands of years before there were any geographers in the world, and consequently before there was any equator. I think, my friends, that I have answered the gentleman completely."

We congratulate our sisters of Illinois on the late decision of the Supreme Court of that State, placing the rights of wives to contract and be contracted with, to hold and enjoy property, to sue and be sued, upon an equality with their husbands. We had supposed, however, that the right of being sued had always been granted to women.

The revivalist Hammond, as reported by the Denver Rocky Mountain News of April 2, declares that "the moral man has as much need of Christ as the vilest of the vile." That certainly is the logic of Orthodoxy, only all its believers are not quite so candid as Mr. Hammond. According to the Orthodox theory of salvation, character really amounts to nothing in the eye of God; the "blood of Christ" alone does the business.

The Morning Star (Baptist) interprets with remarkable discernment the spirit of the age when it says: "The prevailing tendency to-day is in the direction of challenge, and criticism, and change, and independence, and revolution. The old and venerable and accepted meet distrust. Thought is self-asserting and audacious. Everything must undergo analysis. Doubt is becoming popular as well as general."

Mr. C. K. Whipple, of Boston, writes us that the experiment of opening the Public Library in that city, on Sunday afternoons and evenings, has been an entire success; there having been a full attendance, and not a single unfavorable circumstance. He adds: "The city council have now before them a petition, from eminent clergymen and merchants, praying that all departments of the Library may be opened at the same times."

It rejoices us greatly to learn that at least one of the innocent pastimes of our youth has the sanction of Divine authority. The complicated game of "cat's cradle" (sometimes called "cratch cradle") enjoys that sublime distinction. The amiable Episcopalian says: "A friend of ours was recently looking over a copy of an old Bible, printed in London, in the year 1599, called the 'Breeches Bible,' and among many quaint expressions came across the words: 'And she brought forth her first born son, and laid him in a cratch.' Going to Webster's large dictionary to look out this word, we found the following definition: 'Cratch, a manger or open frame for hay.' The childish amusement called making 'cratch-cradle' is an intended representation of the figure of the cratch." Our gratitude for this discovery is without bounds. The "Breeches Bible," Webster's large dictionary, and the Episcopalian, shall occupy henceforth a sunny niche in our memory.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on May 29, 30.

Thursday evening, May 29, session for business and addresses at Parker Fraternity Hall. At this meeting, the question of Radical organization, including that of forming "Liberal Leagues," will be discussed.

Friday, May 30, forenoon and afternoon, Convention for essays and addresses in Tremont Temple. On Friday evening, a Social Subscription Festival is to be held, at which there will also be brief speeches.

A specially attractive Convention, having new features of interest, is anticipated. Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the Boston papers.

DENOMINATIONAL EGOTISM.

There is nothing that so clears up the mind as a true definition; and on the other hand there is nothing that so bejuggles and obscures the mind as a false definition. There is a true and a false definition of everything definable; it is essential to correct thinking, and the advancement of truth among men, that we learn to distinguish between these, and to avoid confounding what is special with what is universal.

There is a class of Christians who call themselves "Liberal." We cheerfully grant that they are so. Indeed, with some of them, there liberality unconsciously goes so far as to cease to be specifically "Christian" and to become purely natural and human. And yet these "Liberal Christians" try very hard to keep their liberality within Christian limits, and to make at the same time their Christianity liberal and their liberality Christian. To do this, they have to do what poor boys often do—wear their clothes even after they have outgrown them. The liberality of these "Liberal Christians" is really a big boy; but because he is poor in logic, or poor in courage, he still tries to wear the Christian clothes which he has really outgrown. This alone he might do, and we would be generous and not laugh at him. But either because he feels like the fox who, in his tall-iness, grieved to find himself out of fashion with his fellows and tried to persuade them to doff their tails also, or because of some other equally good or bad reason, this lusty "liberal" not only perseveres himself to wear his shrunken Christian garments, but tries to clap the same inadequate suit on to some others who, as liberals too, have decided to dress in the larger clothes of free religion.

James Freeman Clarke has recently been reviewing, in the Christian Register, O. B. Frothingham's new book entitled The Religion of Humanity. Mr. Clarke, as we should expect, finds much in this book to admire, and some things to differ from. He especially admires Mr. Frothingham in it; because the author, as every good author does, has not only written his thought and feeling into his book, but also his spirit, his soul, his very life and character. Mr. Clarke is constrained to admit, he unstintingly does admit, that all these are very superior and very admirable. Mr. Clarke knows that Mr. Frothingham is not now a Unitarian; that he is not now distinctively a Christian (although we are not aware that Mr. Frothingham has ever publicly disclaimed the term); that he long since ceased to attend, with any strictly denominational sympathy, Unitarian or Christian conventions; that he is President of the Free Religious Association, and a conspicuous and earnest champion of the Free Religious movement. Mr. Clarke knows all this; he knows that Mr. Frothingham's liberality is not being pinched in any outgrown Church-clothing, but is wearing a full new suit the fashion of which even the "Liberal" Church abominates. And yet because Mr. Frothingham commands Mr. Clarke's respect and admiration as a good man—a brave, pure, sweet, true, noble man—he tries to make it appear that, after all, he is wearing a sort of (to himself) invisible suit of the Christian pattern. Says Mr. Clarke: "Mr. Frothingham cannot help being a Christian in spirit, character, and interior faith, however much he may depart from the Christian profession."

Now are we right in calling this denominational egotism? It is a Christian saying that Christianity is so good there can be nothing better; it is so true there can be nothing truer; it is so large there can be nothing larger. It is a Christian confounding his little specialty with the universal. Mr. Clarke, we believe, is fond of syllogisms; with a (of course) Christian syllogistic trap we suppose he caught the unwitting Mr. Frothingham, thus: "Every good man is a Christian; Mr. Frothingham is a good man; therefore Mr. Frothingham is a Christian." But is every good man a Christian, willy, nilly? Jesus we grant was a good man, and Paul was a good man (we are not sure which was the better); these two made Christianity—the one by claiming to be the Christ, the other by preaching that this one was the Christ. But there were good men before Jesus and Paul; men who had made religions, too. There was Moses; we wish all Christians were as good as he was. There was Sakya Muni, spiritual twin-brother of Jesus in most respects. There was Confucius, a wise and noble man, who fathered the "Golden Rule" hundreds of years before Jesus was born. Why can not the Jew, or the Buddhist, or the follower of Confucius just as consistently claim as the Christian that Mr. Frothingham, because he is a good man, belongs to their household of faith? We doubt not that Mr. Frothingham might wish himself to be as true and good as any of these distinguished men, and yet at the same time decline the name which the professed disciples of either might wish to name him with.

We have never specially antagonized the Christian name, nor have we ever proposed to run after it or run from it. But whatever it may be stretched or contracted to mean, it is not synonymous with goodness. Goodness is older than Christianity, and both the thing itself and the name of it will last longer than Christianity will. A man may be a good man, may even be the best man that ever lived, and not be a Christian, because Christ is no more to him than half-a-dozen other grand prophets and inspirers of humanity: he needs them all, one to complement the other, but owns no special allegiance to any. When will liberals, when will radicals (we have heard Mr. Clarke claim to be both) cease to befuddle themselves and to try to befuddle others with a sentiment about Christ and Christianity which is illogical, unhistorical, and unscientific? For sweet pity's sake let us be kind to everything; for justice's sake let us be just to everything; but for the truth's sake let us perceive and acknowledge the limitations which fetter everything that is not as free and progressive as the truth itself.

GOING AND COMING.

Whoever thoughtfully studies the life of the Christian as ideally inculcated in the New Testament, and compares it with the life of the Christian as actually led under the influences and circumstances of the modern world, cannot fail to be struck with the utter incongruity of the two. The resemblance between them is purely nominal and imaginary. I do not mean merely that the fact falls below the conception as the actual always falls below the ideal; that is of course to be expected. But I mean that the ideal professed and the ideal lived by are radically incompatible. They are not in the same direction, and diverge so visibly to-day that the long-cherished dream of ultimately establishing the "kingdom of Christ" throughout the earth is manifestly fading away, as impracticable except by totally abandoning the New Testament idea of the "kingdom," and substituting for it a thoroughly Pickwickian one.

For instance, the injunction not to lay up treasures on earth, but in heaven, is one of the chief commands of Jesus,—one of the most characteristic features of Christianity in all ages. Yet commerce and trade, without which the world would suddenly stagnate, command men directly to lay up treasures on this earth. There is no possibility of reconciling these contradictory injunctions; and Christians almost universally obey the latter of the two. They do not even pretend to frown on money-getting; they enter into the sharp competitions of business as eagerly as the most unregenerate; they set as great store by worldly success as the vilest publican of the crowd. Yet they go to church on Sunday, and devoutly echo the Scripture lesson: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal."

And so with many others of the chief teachings of the New Testament, which are verbally honored and practically contemned by those who are accounted the most eminent, exemplary, and pious members of the churches. Like the Southern Confederacy, Christianity is merely a "hollow shell," which is getting pun-tured everywhere in these days of critical invasions. The "Christian world" does not even attempt to carry out the ideal it professes to uphold as enjoined by the law of God; and the "outside world" is not slow to recognize the fact. A little book has just been published in England with the significant title, Modern Christianity a Civilized Heathenism; and, under the form of a dialogue between a Church of England clergyman and a Parsee who is studying for the English bar, it makes sharp thrusts at the delusion so widely prevalent that Christendom is really governed by Christian ideas. The passage here appended is strikingly forcible and true:—

"You have made an egregious mistake in calling this country a Christian country. It is nothing of the sort. It is a genuine heathen country. Its principles are heathen. Its policy is heathen. Its laws are heathen. Look at that newspaper on the table. From the first column to the last it is utterly heathen, and it forms the expression of public opinion throughout the land. I am not abusing it. I delight in it. I read my Times every day, and my Saturday every week. I don't always agree with what they say, though I generally find that on most subjects of general interest they take a sound and sensible view. But it is always a purely heathen view. The editors themselves would not pretend that it is otherwise. It is the view of writers who leave Christ entirely out of the question—who would never dream of stopping to consider what Christ might have to say about this or that. They would laugh at you if you suggested such a thing. The public press is concerned with the rights of the people, the prosperity of the country, and the temporal welfare of mankind. It utterly ignores Christ and Christianity. And yet you Christians read it, regulate your opinion by it, suffer it to influence insensibly your thoughts, your principles, your moral tone. And all this while you cannot doubt that, if Christ should come on earth again, the very first thing he would do would be to denounce the modern newspaper as being godless, and devilish, and abominable. How could he do otherwise? Is it conceivable that Christ and the Times should exist together—that he whose purpose is to subdue the hearts of all men to himself should suffer them at one and the same time to be subdued by a power so gigantic as Public Opinion? Could he permit, do you suppose, the discussion of creeds and doctrines on the heathen principle of Common Sense, and not on the Christian principle of what God has chosen to reveal? Of course he could not; the two systems are as fire and water; and the very fact that you persons allow the Times to be brought to your houses shows plainly enough how you have abandoned Christianity and drifted quietly into Civilization."

Thus the active thought of the age is coming more and more clearly to comprehend that Christianity, notwithstanding its power, its prestige, its wealth, is a fast perishing religion; and that Civilization is quietly taking its place. Is all that elevating, ennobling, purifying, idealizing, also perishing with Christianity? I do not believe it. The heart of humanity is ever young; and it throbs with ever deeper pulses at the thought of truth, of goodness, of God. Let us be infinitely hopeful of the future of our race.

MORE OR LESS.

A standard, and to them a satisfactory and conclusive, argument against the Free Religious men, from the side of the "Christians," is this: "Granting the positions taken by the friends of Free Religion, Christianity includes them all, and a great deal more; therefore Christianity is the superior system." Allowing the justness of the statement; admitting, that is, that Christianity does include all that our system does (which we not so much doubt as question, and even deny), the argument is a singular one for discerning men to put forward. No man keenly discerning ever would urge it. The appeal to quantity instead of to quality is alone enough to condemn it. To count doctrines is no more convincing than to count evidences. Proofs tell by virtue of weight, not by virtue of numbers. Tried by numbers, the oldest faiths will always come out best: does it follow that they are best? The "Evangelical" may say to the Unitarian: "My faith has all that yours has, and a great deal more. I have the Divine Unity, and besides a Trinity within it, which you have not. The infinite worth of man I hold with you, and supplement it with a belief in irresistible grace. The humanity of Jesus is part of my creed, but along with it goes his divinity. That the Christ is our brother, my Church delights to think; but that he is our Savior too, it rejoices to confess. We study the Bible by the light of reason, as you do; but we are happy in the persuasion that our reason is illuminated by the Holy Spirit. The Evangelical system accepts the Unitarian doctrine that the Holy Ghost is an influence, but has the advantage in that it worships it also as a Person. Evangelical Christianity is therefore superior to Unitarian Christianity."

In the same way, Romanism might argue with Protestantism. That has everything which is essential in Protestantism, and a great deal more. It has Trinity, deity of Christ, vicarious atonement, everlasting punishment; and over and above all this, it has purgatory, free will, transubstantiation, worship of angels and saints, the mass, confession, extreme unction, penance, absolution, a complete hierarchy, tradition, apostolical succession, infallibility, a visible Church, a mother of God, relics with miraculous efficacy, holy coats, sacraments, intercession, indulgences, and a thousand nice things beside, which a good many people find convenient.

In Jesus' time the Pharisees had the same argument. They could, and probably did, say to him: "What have you that we have not? The Beatitudes, the precepts of your Sermon on the Mount, the petitions of your model prayer, the lessons of the parables, your doctrines of the Heavenly Father, of Providence, of the resurrection, of the kingdom of heaven—they are all in our books. You borrowed them from us. But see how many things we have which you have not! The temple, the priesthood, sacrifices, feast days and fast days, the traditions of the elders, the doctrines of the fathers, the moral and the ceremonial law, washing of cups and platters, tithes of mint, anise, and cummin, the Sabbath, handsome phylacteries, and the consciousness of being the elect people. This proves that the old system has in every respect the advantage over your new-fangled one."

The statement of this argument is, its refutation; the reductio ad absurdum is conspicuous to a blind man. Faiths are distinguished by the points they throw into prominence, not by the points they keep in the shadow. They are marked by their emphasis. If they lay no stress on essential matters, they cannot be credited with their possession. The Christian system, as interpreted by Dr. Bellows or Dr. Clarke, may comprise the truths thrust forward by Mr. Abbot and Mr. Potter; but so long as they are made incidental, secondary, and even insignificant, they are of no account in the scheme; and might be dropped without detriment to it. The truths a faith buries certainly do not characterize it; if they did, there would never have been occasion for new departures in doctrine. It was because Judaism made no account of the truths which Jesus laid stress on; it was because Romanism was silent about the matters that to Luther were of prime moment; it was because "Orthodoxy" made naught of the ideas which were vital to Channing,—that those movements were demanded. And it is because "Christianity" pays less than no regard to the verities which are of supreme interest in the eyes of Mr. Abbot, that Free Religion sprang into life.

Another thing. Reform in religion is always marked by the lopping off of redundancies, the dropping of doctrinal and ceremonial luggage, and reduction to a few simple terms. The reform of Jesus was; the reform of Luther was: the reform of Wesley was; the reform of Channing was; the reform of Mr. Abbot and the free religious men is. Eclecticism is a sign of decay. When a religion begins to count its articles, and prides itself on its having something for everybody, it is already moribund. The religion of the future will care less to be comprehensive than to be true; less to be accommodating than to be vital; less to be complaisant than to be scientific; less to cover a large area than to have a sincere root; less to include many communions than to strike a principle; less to comprise everything than to bring into the light something. Other faiths may boast of having a great many more things; it will be content to have two or three good things. O. B. F.

LONDON LETTER.

PROFESSOR ANGELO DE GUBERNATIS ON ZOOLOGICAL MYTHOLOGY—THE ANCIENT CUSTOM OF CANDLE-AUCTIONS.

LONDON, April 1, 1878.

I have not seen, in any of the American reviews or journals, notice of a very extraordinary and valuable work which has recently been published in this country by Mr. Trübner,—to whom students of mythology and of Oriental literature owe so large a debt. The work to which I allude is Zoological Mythology, by Angelo De Gubernatis, Professor of Sanskrit at Florence. Professor De Gubernatis is such an excellent linguist that he has written his work in English as well as in Italian, himself, and in clear expressive English, too. He is an earnest believer in the fundamental doctrines of the solar and lunar mythologists, and he has traced out the myths relating to the animals associated with the historic religions of the world with great learning and discrimination.

The immeasurable realms of inquiry which have been opened up by the discovery of the Oriental fountains of fable have been so vast as to be confusing to students. Grimm, Limrock, Manhardt, have been almost as men wandering in forests or endless labyrinths, and able to bring back heaps of the golden cones and singing leaves which the new science had showered on them to leave them unclassified. The work of the Rev. G. W. Cox, The Mythology of the Aryan Nations, though written with immense labor and a fine enthusiasm, is unsatisfactory, from this cause; just as a cabinet of shells, minerals, fossils, and rare plants would be, if all mixed up together. There seems to be need that the workers in these great fields should agree upon some principle for the distribution and economy of labors. That one should take up the plant-lore, another the animal-lore; one the dragon, another the griffin; one the night, another the day,—but no, the day would include all the rest, being the matrix of every god.

This work by Professor De Gubernatis suggests, however, that even one among the above-named kingdoms of mythology is too vast for any one scholar to deal with in his single lifetime. Here are two volumes, making about nine hundred large octavo pages, each sentence freighted with its fact, and yet it is plainly but an introduction to zoological mythology. "I am well aware," says the author, "that mythical and legendary lore could offer me ten or twenty times as much material as I have here elaborated." He has given two hundred and sixty-one pages to the cow and bull; twenty-two to the horse; seventy-five to the ass; one hundred and forty-two to the sheep, ram, and goat; sixteen to the hog, wild boar, and hedgehog; twenty-three to the dog; thirty-five to the cat, weasel, mouse, mole, quail, ichneumon, scorpion, ant, locust, and grasshopper; seven to the stag and deer; eight to the elephant; five to the monkey and bear; twenty-five to the fox, jackal, and wolf; thirty-one to the lion, tiger, panther, and chameleon; nine to the spider; eighteen to the hawk, eagle, vulture, phoenix, harpy, strix, bat, griffin, and siren; twenty-seven to the wren, beetle, and firefly; eight to the bee, wasp, gnat, mosquito, cicada; ten to the cuckoo, heron, partridge, nightingale, swallow, sparrow, and hoopoe; eighteen to the owl, crow, magpie, and stork; twenty-one to the woodpecker and martin; nineteen to the lark and quail; six to the cock and hen; fifteen to the dove, duck, goose, and swan; twenty-six to the parrot; three to the peacock; six to fishes generally; twenty-five to the crab; six to the tortoise; eleven to the frog, etc.; seventeen to the serpent and aquatic monsters. Of the above the mythology of either horse, dog, phoenix, cat, stag, dove, swan, stork, or wolf, would easily fill volumes as large as these. The serpent-mythology could not be comprised in a dozen such. But the limitation which the Florence professor has placed upon himself is a wise one, and the result is an infinitely suggestive book. It is especially valuable from the fact that nearly all of our illustrations of folklore have hitherto been from German tradition, and Italy has been too much neglected. It has been known for a long time that the Roman Catholic local lore of Italy represented innumerable survivals of pagan myths—that most of the beautiful goddesses had let their mantles fall on the Madonna, and all the gloomy deities were funded in the Devil; but so much light was never cast in this direction before. Some instances are novel and very curious. For example: "It is narrated that before the birth of St. Dominic, the famous inventor of the tortures of the Holy Inquisition (a truly satanic Lucifer), his mother, being pregnant of him, dreamed that she saw a dog carrying a lighted brand about setting the world on fire. St. Dominic truly realized his mother's dream,—he was really this incendiary dog; and therefore in the pictures that represent him the dog is always close to him with the lighted brand. Christ is the Prometheus, enlarged, purified, and idealized; and St. Dominic the monstrous Vulcan (deteriorated, diminished, and fanaticized), of the Christian Olympus. The dog, sacred in pagan antiquity to the infernal deities, was consecrated to St. Dominic, the incendiary; and to Rocco, the saint who protects the sick of the plague. The Roman feasts in honor of Vulcan (Volcanalia) fell in the month of August; and the Roman Catholic Church fetes, in the month of August, the two saints of the dogs of the fire and the plague, St. Dominic and St. Rocco. There is a legend of this St. Rocco that, when he was lying starving under a tree, Jesus sent his dog to carry him some bread. In the Rig Vedas, the dog Sarama is a messenger between the upper and infernal deities; and in popular superstition his howling still presages death. Professor De Gubernatis indicates a remarkable correspondence between the great mythologic riders, Dioscuri, Mars, Apollo, Pluto, Wuotan, and the saintly Norsemen, St. George, St. Michael, St. Martin, etc., pointing the resemblance with the remark that religions, from our point of view, are the caricatures of mythologies.

But I must not attempt to give you any selections from this important work, in which every page is weighty with insight and knowledge. I have wished to call attention to it because it is not a work likely to be reprinted in America, but would be of much value to many of your readers. It would, of course, be more important to the English or American student, if more of the lingering superstitions of the North were comparatively treated in connection with it. It would have been interesting to trace the sacred Bull of Egypt until it became the ox of the Parisian Bonapartes with its garlands; or the sacred Stud of Indra until it leads the funeral procession of the Duke of Wellington. (Less than one century ago, 1781, at the grave of the Commander of Lorraine, at Treves, his horse was slaughtered as a sacrifice.) But one must not complain that no one author can do everything, and we must be thankful that we now have the materials fairly mined and at our doors with which we can remodel for knowledge the temples which were built for superstition. I have never before seen a book which so plainly shows in what trifles the vast and complex systems of theology have been born. The author relates an anecdote of himself which will answer for a parable. "My family," he says, "was living in a remote part of Piedmont: one autumn evening, towards night, one of my elder brothers pointed out to me, over a distant mountain, a dark cloud of rather a strange shape, saying, 'Look down there; that is a hungry wolf running after the sheep.' He convinced me so entirely of that cloud being really a hungry wolf running upon the mountain, that fearing it might, in default of sheep, overtake me, I instantly took to my heels and escaped into the house. The credulity which we find in children may give us an idea of the credulity of infant nations." Thus from within, man spun the light web that priests have made into the iron coil that imprisons him.

How long a belief or custom may survive all traces of its origin is having an illustration here just now in one recently noted upon, the explanation of which antiquarians are trying their powers thus far in vain. It has been discovered that the practice of letting by inch of candle still prevails in the county of Dorset. At the annual letting of the parish meadows of Broadway, near Weymouth, which occurred a few weeks ago, an inch of candle was placed on a piece of board nine inches square, and lighted by one of the parish officers. The biddings were taken down by one of the parish officers, and the chance of taking the meadow was open to all while the candle was burning. The last bidder, before the candle went out, was the incoming tenant. This year the candle was extinguished suddenly. The land, about two acres in extent, was in 1624 presented to the poor by William Gould, the object of the gift being to keep the poor from working on the highways. It is not improbable that this custom of the candle-auction is connected remotely with Dr. Watt's lines:—

"While the bump holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

M. D. C.

One of the navvies saved from the loss of the Northfleet off the English coast was overheard by the correspondent of the London Standard to say: "When I saw what was up, I said, sez I, I'm agoin' to die, and, damn it, I may as well do it as comfortable as I can; and so I lit my pipe." On this the Spectator remarks: "All the combined forces of all the spiritual motives that Christianity has given us, after near two thousand years of influence, do not weigh as much as a bowl of tobacco against the death-panic with the majority of Englishmen."

IT IS A PRESUMPTUOUS WISH, I doubt not, but it would be a real satisfaction if one could hear straight from the lips of the bloody Modocs the story of the war. What will impartial(?) history write concerning this whole race of American "savages"? "Why did you murder Gen. Canby, Captain Jack?" Shall we suppose his sole answer must be: "Out of pure devilry"? As I look at it, "peace policy" or "war policy," it is all one and the same to these red men. Says the great father: "Peaceably if you will, forcibly if you won't; but anyhow you must 'move on,' and build your wigwams where I say." Well, human nature is much the same under skin of all colors. The tragedy at the lava beds dates back, how far—who can tell? It is a terrible deed, but already it is more than paralleled in Louisiana. "Civilization" can slaughter and burn alive its victims as well as "barbarism." Temper your vengeance, white man; for you too live in a house of glass! Sad—pitiful!

"I AM NOT MAD," said Paul. George Francis Train says the same; but scarcely does he seem to speak forth "words of soberness." And yet his unsober words often hit very near the mark. The sober New Yorkers wince, and then fall into a sympathy for the prisoner. Taking compassion on him, they would rather send him to an asylum than to State-prison. But he says: "I quoted the Bible, word for word. Not knowing whence it came, they arrested me for the circulation of obscene literature. They find out their blunder; and thus it comes about that they would rather send me to a lunatic asylum than convict me as a criminal. For to condemn me thus would be to condemn their Bible. Ha, ha!" There is something in it, more than can easily be disposed of. Curious is the spectacle. Strange and rather startling are some of the definitions of insanity. This for instance, rendered by a medical expert: "Intellectual insanity is an unsound state of mind, a delusion of the mind, out of which the patient cannot be reasoned by such evidence as would convince the majority of mankind." If all the doctors should agree upon this, what may not become of other people besides the "coming dictator"?

SOME ASTONISHING PERSON has been interviewing Mr. Bellew, and has published the same in a daily paper. "What do you think of us Americans?" asks he. "You are the most social and hospitable people I ever met with," is the response. "Comparing my personal experience with the expressions of various English writers in their works upon Americans, my opinions differ totò cœlo from theirs. I find in this country as much high breeding, intellectual thought, literary accomplishment, as can be met with anywhere." Ah, this is too much! "I am glad to hear you say so," exclaims our enthused countryman. "I shall always cherish the privilege I have enjoyed in social and after-dinner conversation, not only with your distinguished men, but with the general body of your society," &c. Once more our countryman: "I hope you will say that, when you return to England!" "Never fear," quoth Mr. Bellew; and soon after "the writer withdrew highly gratified with his cordial reception by Mr. Bellew, who is evidently himself an accomplished conversationalist and profound thinker; and, above all, a whole-souled gentleman." How charming it all is! So much high compliment from our English cousins! Who of us henceforth will not fairly hug his American self?

I HAVE HEARD MR. BELLEW. Fresh, breezy, clean, hearty: you are made to feel very comfortable as he enters and takes his place by the stand. When he speaks, you think, "What a deep and powerful voice! Clear-toned, too, it is; and, perchance, musical." When the end comes, you recur to the performance to see how it impressed you. You naturally do this, for you have heard so much praise spoken of this man's recitations, you want to know if you yourself are quite in tune with reported public opinion. Be honest now; say just what you think: what was the fact as you listened to Mr. Bellew? "Well, to speak the truth: he read Maud Muller; I have heard it read better, much better. He overdoes the thing quite. Maud herself would have run away, frightened. He read Burial March of Dundee; it fell on my ear like rant, elegant rant. Sorry to say so; but such was the fact. And yet—I own it—it split the ears of a refined assembly! He read The Bloomsbury Christening; this time I was vastly pleased. Let Mr. Bellew stick to the humorous side of things, and the encore shall be unanimous. But he can't read Shakspeare, 'historical or tragical!'

A VERY REMARKABLE MAN was Samuel J. May, of Syracuse, N. Y. A very true man. And this little word, interpreted by his life, has a most winsome sound. I do not mean that he was studied and proper, full of wearisome endeavor. He did not obtrude his truthness upon you. He did not make you feel uncomfortable as in the presence of saintship. No Pharisaic tone or look. Simple and sweet-tempered to the centre outward; heroic in the same way, and his truth was as natural a thing as the No Pharisee, I say. I mean that he was a man consciously gotten up, self-made, trimmed and squared to moral and spiritual rules. Principles and beautiful laws were his delight; how should it be otherwise than that he got into their mould and fashion! All ranks conditions tuned and played upon his sympathies. His heart stirred in commiseration the poor rich-man equally as for the poor poor man. He knew neither high nor low in artificial sense so common. And the really he saw transfigured through the lens of a boyless and enduring faith in the nature of man. No proclamation of depravity daunted him. "You exhibit these, do you," he seemed to "and croak of total wickedness! I will fling plummet that will touch a depth in every of them." By a word or deed he would be his would be foes to themselves, to a self seldom dreamed of. By a single stroke of Nature is the kinship of mankind revealed! Our civilization so hard and concealed, vaulting itself, wonder the un-civilized, disgusted, levy war. "My faults are as good as your virtues—out with you!" Mr. May was more than civilized was humanized; and no poor, mad soul returned from him crushed and vengeful.

The Memoirs of Mr. May, which Mr. Mayford has edited and Roberts Brothers publish calls up in my mind this picture of the man which I have tried to describe with few words. One little incident reported by Mr. May himself in this book, I must set down for the good it offers. While yet a youth, "doubts" arisen to trouble him. He went timidly to a clergyman to lay the case before him. "I am glad you have arrived at a doubt," said Ware. Surprised, young May still felt that ought to be able to know for a certainty what the "essential truths" were. "All truth is essential," said the minister. "You are bound to believe whatever at any time shall appear to be true; and you are bound to believe it, you shall cease to be satisfied that it is true. You sincerely desire and long for the truth, Father of your spirit will not permit you to remain satisfied with error." "I have no since," writes Mr. May, "been afraid to put any inquiry after truth, however it might seem to endanger long-cherished opinions."

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE of this city holds monthly meetings at the Fraternity Room, discussing various points of interest, getting ready for whatever work lies before it in near or distant future. At a late meeting following letter from Mr. Weiss was read: "What stirring revolutionary appeals this season, in olden times, could have been led to date! It is barely possible its services may come into play, to summon the unready wavering to a new deliverance:—

Geo. A. Bacon, Esq.:

Dear Sir.—It seems to me that the vigorous development of scientific thought for the past fifty years, minuting as it does in theories which cut away the foundations of the popular theology, is one of the most suggestive of all persons, of whatsoever sect, who desire to preserve their old dogmas and perpetuate their authority over the mind of man. It appears, more plainly every day, a rivalry between the coalition of honest thinking and the acquiescent old-fashioned doctrine and sentiment. The snipe of tradition are quite acute enough to anticipate sweeping series of catastrophes which will overthrow their assumptions, if the drift of modern knowledge cannot be blocked or diverted. But they might expect to take hold of an avalanche when it is and settle it back again in its old site upon the mountain; for our modern tendencies are moving with the laws of a universe inside them. The vigilance of truth is more than proportionate to the alarm of fiction. At least it should be so; and, although I am very well fitted to be an active worker in the labor for whatever object they may be organized, I yet to observe the public spirit which brings more effort men to the front, just behind the great intellect who are discovering facts, reducing them to system, harmony, and offering the results of free religion, are our pioneers; they break the way through which light may fall, to disinfect and fertilize, and from the smoke of innumerable household altars, deduced to simple love and truth, may rise to announce neighborhood to heaven. Let us follow into the country which is overgrown with jungles of dogma and claim its area for the civilizing truth. It is, therefore, essential to insist upon the original idea of public government, viz., that all men are entitled to the happiness of knowing what is fit, what is right from error, what binds to laws, what builds to comfort and self-respect of souls. We desire to do the divine intention in the meanest item and broadest scale; to consult knowledge, not churches, or creeds for the articles of our belief; first as we find them, to make them incorporate into public government and undivided religion. Let us retain inviolate mankind's title to win freedom by and to preserve it by as much more of truth as nature yet conceals from us.

Very truly yours,
JOHN W.

WATERTOWN, April 18, 1873.

A country clergyman paying a professional visit to a dying neighbor, who was a veryish and universally unpopular man, put the questions: "Are you willing to go, my friend?" "Oh, yes!" said the sick man, "I am." "I said the simple-minded minister, "I am sure you are, for the neighbors are willing."

THE "BLUE CROOK" STYLE OF INVENTING FOR THE PULPIT.—It is one thing for the "good old times," in politics or religion; indeed, it is doubtful if these same times were really any better than the new, or so good. Human nature is a "constant quantity," as the mathematicians say, and not itself out with equal wisdom, though it may be in valued forms, from generation to generation. It is a clear gain that the spirit has thrown off something of its stagnation and stiffness, and has come own a much nearer the level of the world. It is a gain that the parish minister is less of a monk and more of a man; that if he is spiritual, he is in touch with the rest of the world, and "comes up" to it.

But it is quite possible to run a very odd thing into the ground, and we all are a prejudice against divines who are into pulpits the stretch of the of lights, and copy the show-bills in their published advertisements. One "this kidney is responsible for the flowing "pastoral announcements," into a secular paper for the better information of the public: "O—church. The pastor, Rev. —, will preach to-morrow morning. Sermon—'Up a Tree!' Afternoon sermon—'The Strange Contents of a Lost Book.' Think of that in connection with one of our old Puritan churches. It is enough almost to presitate a resurrection of the scandalous fathers. This is not all, however.
The card announces other attractions:
this Sunday theatre, as follows:
Act 8, 'Deformed Feet;' Dec. 22, he Tragic History of a White Lie;'
Act 29, 'Frosted Locks;' Jan. 12, 'Go Jericho!' Jan. 19, 'Beautiful Shoes;' Jan.
26, 'Salt Again!'"

Without this sort of thing will be the "Black Crook," or the "Wonderful Majiltons," or "Intrepid Female Trapezist." But it does not prevent us from being

UNIVERSALISM AND METHODISM.
When ministers of religion, whose sion of faith gives special prom-se to "hell and damnation," i that stage where they are revels of Christian culture, what it mean? Can we escape these inferences: 1. That these men things? 2. That, whether they or not, the position they take is a

Mr. Ruskin has a somewhat paradoxical but exceedingly suggestive article on "The Nature and Authority of Miracles" in current numbers of the Contemporary Review. He thinks it "contrary to modesty, whether in a religious or scientific point of view, to regard anything as miraculous." "I know so little," he says,
"and this little I know is so inexplicable, that I dare not say anything is wonderful because it is strange to me, and not wonderful because it is familiar." "If a second Joshua to-morrow commanded the sun to stand still, and it obeyed him, and he, therefore, claimed credit as a miracle-worker, I am afraid that I should answer: 'What! a miracle that the sun stand still? Not at all. I was always expecting it would. The only wonder to me was its going on.'"—N. Y. Independent.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age,—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toll-free attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy.
Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows bitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial.
It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has undertaken, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipa-tion of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope

THREE MINISTERS, FIVE D. CTORS AND OTHERS AT MEMPHIS, TENN., IN 1853; ALSO, THE OPINION OF MANY EMINENT DIVINES, LIVING AND DEAD, ON

BY THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON

OF THE

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "Clock Struck One" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century, a man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North, and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference, of which the author is a member, in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above tract can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourteen Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

MODERN THINKER--NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ago have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all bookshelves know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give utterance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

The Old God and the New Humanity	1
A Danger to Civilization	19
Stewart-Astor—Vanderbilt—Letters addressed to three Millionaires on the Social Function of Wealth	90
The Parsons and Propagation	36

Modern Scepticism.—Faith and Free Thought.

(Concluded.)

The mention of the "literal inspiration of Scripture" leads us to make another suggestion. We think that the next session of the Society might be much more advantageously employed, if a few of the lectures, or indeed the whole series, were devoted, with some sort of concert, to a grand offensive movement in favor of inspiration, rather than to desultory and unconnected skirmishes against Atheism, Pantheism, Positivism, and mythical theories of Christianity. It is utterly impossible to do justice to any one of these subjects in an address of three-quarters of an hour, reproduced in thirty or forty pages of large type. As we remarked just now with regard to Bishop Colenso, so we may observe with respect to Herbert Spencer—that his arguments are not only not demolished, they are not even touched, in one of the lectures (that on Pantheism) in which a mention of his name, as a name typical of those against whom the argument was to be directed, had led us to suppose that his "First Principles" might be noticed. Moreover, we are of the opinion—though we must candidly admit that we may be wrong—that Atheism, Pantheism, Positivism, and Mysticism have taken very small hold on the British educated mind. On the other hand, the doctrine of plenary inspiration has most assuredly come to be seriously questioned, and it is incumbent on a body of disputants, banded together for the defence of dogmatic theology, to furnish us with some reasons, suitable to the requirements of the present age, for the maintenance of this doctrine—on which, be it observed, the appalling dogma of eternal punishment rests. This is a very large subject, and having intimated our view—surely a reasonable one—that it might fairly form the theme of a succession of lectures, we are not going to be guilty of the inconsistency of discussing it in a few sentences. But we cannot help expressing, by the way, our own personal conviction that adequate reasons for this belief have never been put before the world from the Protestant point of view. That it was held by the early Fathers and the early Church appears to us not to be an argument, but merely a way of accounting for the origin of the belief historically; not to speak of the danger and in some cases the impossibility of yielding our judgment to such authorities, since the most ancient that we could quote as witnesses to the canon were also believers in the distinctive tenets of Romanism, as well as in magic, dreams, demoniacal possession, the heathen mythology, the early return of Christ. That it can be established on any a priori grounds—the argument, which, as Mr. Greg in his "Creed of Christendom" remarks, "does the business" for most people—that is to say, that it is inconceivable that God should furnish man with a revelation and should not, at the same time, provide him with an infallible record of it, seems to us a perfectly unjustifiable assertion. This ground has been entirely given up by every divine of reasoning powers from St. Augustine to Bishop Butler (the whole scope of whose great work is opposed to any such assumptions), and from Bishop Butler to Dean Alford. St. Augustine declared that he should not feel himself called upon to believe in the Bible unless the Church had bidden him to do so. Bishop Butler declares that we are wholly ignorant how far, or in what way it were to be expected God would interpose miraculously, to qualify those to whom he made a revelation for communicating it, or to secure its being transmitted to posterity ("Analogy," pt. II. chap. iii.); and Dean Alford tells us that "we must take our views of inspiration, not as is too often done, from a priori considerations, but entirely from the evidence furnished by the Scriptures themselves." [N. T., I., sect. vi. 22.] We must therefore turn to the source indicated by the last named writer; and from what passages, or what single passage, in the Bible we are to gather that the whole of it, or any part of it, is necessarily inspired or infallible, we are altogether at a loss to conjecture. We commend this point to the attention of the Christian Evidence Society, and we really think that we are rendering them some service, provided they have any new arguments to offer; for it is certain that no part of the fabric of Orthodoxy is more rapidly crumbling away than this, which has hitherto been its foundation stone. We almost think that we can trace some faint dawn of a presentiment that inspiration will one day have to be given up, in the interesting contribution to this series of the Bishop of Ely, a prelate who has elsewhere recorded his opinion that the New Testament history and doctrines might be capable of proof and deserving of evidence, if inspiration were given up altogether. [In "Aids to Faith," at page 449, we are told that "Mohammedanism, Brahmanism, and Buddhism, have either stifled, or at the best stunted, science and made stagnant civilization." We were rather startled at this, and without going into the case of Brahmanism and Buddhism, we will quote a passage from a book of reference accessible to all—"Chambers Cyclopaedia." "Broadly speaking, the Mohammedans may be said to have been the enlightened teachers of barbarous Europe, from the ninth to the thirteenth century. It is from the glorious days of the Abbaside rulers that the real renaissance of Greek spirit and Greek culture is to be dated. Classical literature would have been irreclaimably lost, had it not been for the home it found in the schools of the 'unbelievers' of the 'Dark Ages.' Arabic philosophy, medicine, natural history, geography, history, grammar, rhetoric, and the golden art of poetry, schooled by the old Hellenic masters, brought forth an abundant harvest of works, many of which will live and teach as long as there will be generations to be taught."] There is another point, in this connection, which merits the attention of the Society, and as to which the educated sceptic demands a reply which he has not yet received. "What is the precise character of the 'inspiration' to which you claim our assent?" We are aware that many volumes have been written on this subject, but we must say, with Cardinal Wiseman, "that, having perused with great attention all that has fallen in my way from Protestant writers on this subject, I have hardly found one single argument advanced by them that is not logically incorrect." ["Lectures on the Catholic Church," lect. II., p. 37.] Whatever it does mean, it certainly cannot mean that every statement in the Bible is to be accepted as infallibly true, for it is clear that not even a miracle can be invoked to cut the knot of a palpable contradiction. Now, Second Chronicles, xxii. 2, contradicts xxi. 20: we read that God tempted David to number Israel, and that Satan tempted him to do it; while from James we learn that God tempts no man. The accounts of the end of Judas are totally inconsistent with each other. An ingenious writer in the series of Mr. Scott, of Rainsgate, has given one hundred and forty-four specimens of self-contradiction in the Bible. In one sense, we attach no weight whatever to the greater part of these discrepancies; they may be found in every history, from that of Herodotus to that of Mr. Frode. What does it matter whether the apostles on their journey did or did not take staves, or how often the cock crew? The general truth of the narratives is not affected. But from another point of view—when the plea of inspiration is put in—they assume immense importance. They altogether disprove the plea in the only sense in which we are able to understand it. These self-contradictions as to matters of fact, and we may add the variations presented by Scripture to the known truths of science, are as plain a revelation from God to man that whatever else the Bible may be, it is not in all its parts infallibly true, as if he had written a message to that effect on the face of the sun. Accordingly theologians, fairly driven out of their original plea, have for a long time attempted to draft another, with that amount of success which invariably attends all attempts to build in the clouds. We cannot refrain from quoting here a remarkable utterance of Dean (now Bishop) Goodwin:—

"Divine inspiration may imply an absence of errors on physical questions, or it may not; who shall venture to say a priori, whether it does or not? . . . Why not endeavor, by looking at the evidence, to see on which side the truth lies? And if it should appear upon examination, that any chapter contains statements not in accordance with science, then, instead of coming to the conclusion that the Scriptures are not inspired, I should rather come to this—viz., that the idea of inspiration does not involve that accuracy concerning physical things which many persons have imagined that it does."

We hold this to be one of the most dishonest passages ever written. Instead of looking to the Bible and seeing whether in all respects it comes up to the idea which we should form of a divinely inspired communication—and it is all very well to talk about a priori judgments, but this is after all the only test which man can apply to it or can in reason be called upon to apply to it—the Bishop assumes inspiration, and then proceeds to see how far he can make the dogma square with the contents of the book. Supposing a letter were put into our hands purporting to contain an order from our absolute Sovereign. Other people have seen it and pronounced it to be genuine, but then we know that other people have been mistaken before now, and the responsibility is cast upon us of inquiring. Now suppose we were to argue thus:—

"A letter from a sovereign may imply inability to write legibly, errors in spelling and in grammar, errors in plain matters of geography, self-contradictions, &c., or it may not. Why not endeavor, by looking at the letter, to see on which side the truth lies? If it should appear that it contains such errors and mistakes, then instead of concluding that it does not come from the Sovereign, we shall have to infer that a royal communication is not necessarily marked by correct spelling, correct grammar," &c.

If we talked in this ridiculous way, we should be reasoning exactly like Bishop Goodwin. Look at the way in which such an argument as this might be applied to the sacred writings of the Hindus and Persians. We have generally heard it said that their cosmogonies and wild legends and impossible geography are conclusive against their having been inspired from above. But it might fairly be said that this is not a proper mode of contemplating the matter—that the proper method was to look at the books, and if they contained anything opposed to science, to conclude that inspiration did not extend to such subjects as these, but might be quite consistent with the origin of the world, &c., being wrapped up in allegories, however ridiculous these might at first sound to European ears. The Brahmin who argued thus would not be making a much larger demand upon our credulity than the Bishop. Again, if the general inspiration of a book be no guarantee against errors in fact and in science, why should it be a guarantee against errors of another kind—viz., additions to the text? "The three heavenly witnesses" is a notorious interpolation; why are we not entitled to hold that the accounts of the nativity in Matthew and Luke may be legends which have been tacked on to the rest of the narrative? The Bishop would, we suppose, reply that this would be impossible, for that inspiration would imply the absence of such an error as this; in other words, he has formed his own a priori theory of inspiration, which we take to be briefly this: "a guarantee for the absolute truth of every word in the Bible which cannot be proved to be absolutely false. Where falsehood or error is proved, there was no guarantee." At a certain grammar school of our acquaintance, the head-master used to guarantee that he would never flog a sixth-form boy, and we believe that he strictly kept his promise; but the commission of certain offences was held ipso facto to degrade a boy into the fifth, upon which he was immediately birched. The dominie lived before the days of Dean Goodwin, or he might have quoted him as an authority. Less disingenuous because apparently talking nonsense, as Monsieur Jourdain talked prose without knowing it, are Messrs. Webster and Wilkinson in their introduction to the Greek Testament.

"It will be understood that an inspiration which may be truly characterized as direct, personal, independent, plenary, is consistent with the use of an inferior or provincial dialect, with ignorance of scientific facts and other secular matters, with mistakes in historical allusions or references, and mistakes in conduct, and with circumstantial discrepancies between inspired persons in relating discourses, conversations, or events."

We do not know by whom this "will be understood"—certainly not by ourselves. Well may the writer of the Review from which we have taken the above and the preceding extract exclaim, "We draw a long breath, and wonder where we are!" [Edinburgh Review, No. 240, April, 1863.] Yet when he comes to give us his own views on inspiration, he is not one whit less cloudy. "It does not by any means follow," he says, "because a book is inspired by Almighty God, that it should therefore be faultless."

In Nature herself, where no one can deny the finger of God, imperfection, waste, etc., are consistent with the presence and agency of a Divine wisdom. Why may it not be so with the Bible? And he goes on to define what he means by the Bible being inspired. It is "replete itself and pregnant without stint for him that rightly uses it, with that spirit of purity, faith, obedience, charity, which forms the essential temper and characteristic of the Church and family of God."

We do not suppose that any one in England, except an atheist, would object to this definition of inspiration, and even an atheist might in some degree accept it. Every one, we may say, admits that the Old and New Testaments include the most venerable, and, at the same time, the most interesting compositions known to humanity. The Divine Spirit, as we conceive it, certainly does seem to breathe through some of its pages in a way in which it breathes through no other work. And indeed, we should expect this to be the case with the sacred records of the Jews—a people distinctly charged with the sublime part of keeping alive the light of monotheism; and with the records of early Christianity—a creed which, whatever its imperfections, is evidently destined, in what may be called "the natural struggle of religions," to outlive, in some form or other, all others. But then this view of inspiration is not a basis sufficiently solid to found dogmatic Orthodoxy upon. A book which is admitted not to be faultless ceases to be an idol to all of whose utterances we are bound to bow down on pain of damnation. It has been shown to err in some particulars, where we are able to test it. Is there any good reason for supposing that it cannot err in other particulars, where we are unable to apply an exact test?

Here we see an example of the danger of invoking "analogy," as the Orthodox are so fond of doing since Butler showed the way. Why should not the Bible be marked by faults and errors, says the Reviewer, since all God's works in Nature are similarly marked by what we call imperfections? Very well then; but we are entitled to carry the analogy a step further. Why should not the creed set forth in the New Testament be similarly marked by faults and errors and imperfections, as (humanly speaking) is admitted to be the case with everything else from the hand of God? Why should it not be destined to undergo change like all the rest of God's handwork? Why should not Christ have been mistaken in his ideas of a physical and never-ending hell, just as he was evidently mistaken (not to say a word about demoniacal possession) when he announced to his disciples, "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom"? Why should not a belief in miracles, essential to the propagation of a new religion in that stage of the world's history, have been used by Providence as a means of advancing certain truths—like the belief in Christ's immediate return, which was perhaps the most powerful of all the causes in spreading Christianity, but which is now seen to have been a complete delusion—why should they not have been like husks protecting fruits which drop off when the fruits are matured? Why, in short, should not sublime truths have been allowed to make their way in the world mixed up with gross errors; man's appointed task being slowly and laboriously to disengage the truths from the errors? Dreadful as these suppositions may appear to some, they are such as we are fairly landed in by the use of analogy. These are the methods which mark the communication of all other kinds of knowledge by God to man. Why should they not hold good in the domain of religious knowledge?

These considerations might be carried a great deal further, and there are other themes for exercises which we had thought of suggesting to the Christian Evidence Society. But our limits are reached. We do not think that these essays are calculated to have any appreciable effect in restoring the tottering fortunes of Orthodoxy. Here and there, no doubt, an outpost imprudently advanced, may be captured. Here and there an attack, injudiciously and even unfairly made, may be triumphantly resisted. These are the local incidents common to every struggle. But of the general advance of science along the whole line, we can entertain not the slightest doubt. We are equally sure that every additional step in this advance must be increasingly fatal to the claims of Orthodoxy. The species of compromises which are attempted to be set up in some of these papers, and in other works (notably on the great point of "inspiration") are, to use the expression of a daily journal from which we have already quoted, of the nature of a compromise between the new six-hundred-pound shot and the side of an iron-clad. "Either the shot will be smashed, or the plates will be penetrated. There is no middle term."

PAUL GOWER.

OF

INVOLVES A MEETING AND A DEPARTURE.

"I couldn't bear to think of your waiting round the corner, in the cold," she answered, achieving an unconscious anti-climax, "and—and I wanted to see you. At the same time, perhaps I had much better have stopped away, and spared both of us the pain of meeting."

"The pain, dearest?" There had been such an instinctive revival of old affection, and hope, and happiness in his voice and aspect as at once ignored his lugubrious letter, and rendered it more difficult than she contemplated for her to persist in a resolution she had formed—perhaps awoke in her breast a temporary doubt whether it was altogether so unselfish as she had supposed. "That is all over now. Let bygones be bygones. Forgive and forget. We'll begin a new chapter, and never refer to the errors any more."

He spoke lightly, but with such tenderness that Kate's task grew harder and harder, and her voice sounded doleful and guilty in her own ears as, after a great effort, she responded:—

"Don't mistake me, Paul. I came to tell you we had better part, and—and for good. We can never be happy together."

"Why?"

"I thought Mills told you before I went into the country. I haven't altered my opinion, though I trust I am a very different person from the vain, giddy, heartless girl that I used to be; and have been brought to a saving knowledge of my own wicked and deceitful nature. And if you hated and despised me for my behavior to you (as I dare say you do), I know it only serves me right."

"I hate and despise you?" cried Paul, in almost as dismal a tone as her own. "What nonsense! Who ever suggested such a thing?"

"You ought to if you don't, then, for I fully deserve it. I have given you too much reason to consider me entirely destitute of one spark of kindness or affection—even of gratitude—in my unworthy heart. I am very, very sorry, and have been very unhappy about it. And it makes me additionally miserable to find that, instead of being ready to part, as you said in your letter (or else I'm sure I'd better not have come), you're as fond of me as ever, and want to keep on, when it can only end in wretchedness and disappointment, and be to me a source of unutterable remorse and protracted anguish." Whenever she became extraordinarily emotional, Kate commonly inflated her style and used involved grammar, which always annoyed Paul and humiliated him, as disturbing his ideal of her, and reminding him of Tib. On the present occasion, too, her language suggested an unconscious burlesque of his recent letter, while her manner deepened the unfortunate effect; for it was neither natural nor agreeable, though its earnestness redeemed it from the reproach of being ridiculous. Very much perplexed, he held his peace and listened for what might come next.

"I wish," she went on, in the same uncomfortable verbal exaltation, "that I could only restore to you the once light and happy heart that you possessed that night when you first came down into our kitchen and were introduced to me. Then it had not been blighted by the falsehood and indifference of one who returned you good for evil—I mean evil for good; but I have been, for some time, such a prey to excessive nervous excitement, that I hardly know what I'm saying. I am quite aware, however, that I have deserved your curse. But the past is irrevocable, and if I refer to it, it is only in testimony of my repentance, which I hope will be a warning to me not to trifle with anybody's affections so long as I live; though I can't expect you to believe a word of it, after what has occurred. And I know that there could never again be that trust and confidence that there ought to be between us, if I had been able to come to quite a different conclusion to that to which I have been prayerfully guided. And don't think it doesn't give me pain, for it does, and nothing should induce me but a sense of duty." And here Kate burst out crying.

Paul gave vent to an ejaculation which was half oath, half groan. "Speak out and have done with it, Kate," he said. "You don't love me and never did, and intend to break off altogether. Isn't that your meaning?"

Kate only cried more copiously than ever. "I'd do anything to make you happy," she sobbed, abandoning her attitudes; "for you're the best, and d-dearest, and k-k-kindest—the sentence ended abortively in a climax of weeping."

Paul soothed her in a manner at once natural, and affectionate, and practical—the street being a very quiet one, and therefore adapted to it. "Now Kate, darling," he said, after this little indulgence and consolation, "do tell me what is the matter?"

"Oh, Paul! I don't know whether I love you or not, though I'm quite sure there's nobody more deserving of who I like better. But—but it isn't that! There's something else that we used to talk about when I was thoughtless and worldly, and which I didn't much care about then; but now I regard it as essential to our happiness, both here and hereafter. You think quite different from me about religion, and I daren't marry you while you're unconvinced—an unbeliever!" And, the murder out, Kate dried her tears and looked as resolute as she could—which, after her break down and Paul's consolation, was not very much so—and exceedingly miserable.

I shall spare the reader the theological controversy which now ensued, as it would only be productive of weariness of spirit and waste of space; and as poor Paul's heterodoxy will be sufficiently disclosed in the course of this story, and also what came of it. It was a dismal interview, for Kate was thoroughly in earnest and seemed quite another creature from her former coquette, impulsive, wilful, and warm-hearted self; though the alteration was rather a new development than a change of character. She opposed so many objections to her lover's pleading as almost to drive him to despair. For a couple of hours they paced the dreary streets, strolling westwards—for she would not re-tread old walks—until her persistence provoked an explosion of anger on the part of Paul which proved, in the end, far more effective than his solicitations. He reproached and taunted her with more severity than he had ever used before, accusing her at once of insensibility and heartlessness—in fact, of being unconsciously influenced by worse selfishness than she had ever exhibited in her unregenerate condition. This naturally produced more tears, more practical consolation, and a partial reconciliation. Before he quitted her (at as near to her father's house as he thought it prudent to venture), he had extorted a promise that she would meet him again and answer his letters. With which concessions, sundry kisses, and an exhortation to turn up his coat collar, as "It was so cold," Paul was fain to be content and to bid her adieu. And so they parted.

It was, indeed, a bitter cold night—one of the severest of that remarkable hard winter. As Paul turned his face homewards, it was numbed by the icy wind, which had been rising throughout the evening, and now blew almost a gale, clearing the streets and making a dismal, blustering sound overhead, quite awesome to listen to. The wind and the darkness together—for no moon was visible, and a rack of heavy, black clouds moved rapidly and continuously athwart the heavens—awoke an answering disquiet in the young man's breast, such as he afterwards identified with the night and what had occurred on it; of which he was yet ignorant. He could almost have persuaded himself that he had anticipated it. Thus harassed by a curious restlessness, he walked swiftly to the house near the Hampstead Road.

It was nearly eleven o'clock when he arrived thither, but lights were moving from window to window, and the door was opened to him, before he had time to raise the knocker. The little maid, Becky, drew him silently into the passage and into the front parlor. There were voices talking in strangely hushed tones in the adjoining room.

"Oh, Master Paul!" the girl said, with the tears streaming down her face (it was remarkable how minutely outward objects—the familiar furniture of the apartment, the dull lamp with its light half-turned down, the partially opened door leading into the next room, the hushed voices—seemed to impress themselves on his attention at such a moment), "your grandfather is dead! He died quite sudden after tea-time, be-

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Second Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held on Saturday, June 7, at 2 1/4 P. M., in the office of THE INDEX, No 143 St. Clair street, Toledo.

The Church festival of Easter seems to be celebrated, now-a-days, more by good music than good preaching.

James Freeman Clarke says: "Christianity has all that Free Religion has, and a great deal more,"—except freedom.

The Golden Age says that "the American press is not run by Evangelical Christians; if it were, it would be as bad as the American Congress."

The Boston Investigator has just entered on its forty-third volume and the thirty-fifth year of its existence. It is a veteran and vigorous journal, and we are glad to see it prosper.

The Golden Age calls Dr. J. G. Holland "the pleasantest of platitudinarians,"—an alliterative definition of "Timothy Titcomb" which is most felicitous.

A fearful mania for murder seems to be sweeping through the land just now, and all the examples of capital punishment are powerless to stop it. Nothing but a radically different religion, and a consequent nobler civilization than now prevails, can reach and cure the cause of crime.

Henry Ward Beecher styles the present Sunday-school literature "the swill of the house of God." That is more Beechery than elegant, especially when we remember that it was in one of his elaborate lectures to the Yale divinity students.

Rev. Father Burke (Catholic) says that it is, "alas, too true that modern scepticism, modern irreligion, and indifference, have absorbed some among the best and brightest intellects of our time." It is indeed significantly true that the most enlightened intellects are, and ever have been, antagonistic to the Church.

The "Emerald Isle" has lately, by the most pretentious and formal ceremonies of the Catholic Church, been "solemnly dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus!" We are not sure that we understand exactly what that means; but we shall expect that hereafter Ireland will be a model country as to sweetness, gentleness, humility, patience, and goodness.

Rev. Mr. Hepworth, in his Easter sermon, said that "the historical fact of the resurrection of Christ is beyond all doubt and cavil." Learned man! How could he, in his short life, have acquired so much and such accurate information! Mister Hepworth should be made Doctor Hepworth at once. We nominate him for that degree to Harvard, or Yale, or any other college that will undertake him. Do not let it be delayed until somebody's mischievous "doubt and cavil" shall assail this "historical" fact.

In his lectures before the Yale divinity students, Henry Ward Beecher declares himself in favor of "revivals." He advises the young men, however, not to attempt a "revival" during a political campaign, because "one excitement is enough at a time;" nor should they attempt it in the country during harvest-time, because God's harvesting and man's cannot well be done at the same time! If "revivals" are for the purpose of saving souls from hell, as is the common church-theory, we should say that they never could be out of season, but should be held every day in the year.

ANOTHER DEFINITION OF CHRISTIANITY.

Rev. Mr. Buck, of Portland, Maine, a very able preacher in the Unitarian denomination, has lately had occasion to present to the public his definition of Christianity. He preached an Easter sermon which was printed in the Portland Press, and which proved very obnoxious to the Orthodox clergymen of that city, some of whom made a violent attack upon its doctrines. Mr. Buck replied to his critics in another sermon, also printed in the Press, in which he took for his subject, "Christianity and Infidelity." He has been kind enough to send us both of these discourses, and we have read them with much pleasure, abated only by the regret that one who is so liberal a Christian might not go still farther and be a liberal without any denominational constraint whatever,—espousing utterly and consistently the cause of natural religion, instead of suffering detention within the hindering limits of a historical religion which revolves around the personal doctrine and example of one eminently good man.

That all the readers of THE INDEX may see just how liberal Mr. Buck's Christianity is (who is himself an INDEX subscriber), we here reproduce a distinguishing paragraph from his second discourse:—

"I resume the question, What is Christianity? Let us narrow the inquiry by finding some definition which, either by obvious propriety, or by general consent, is above dispute. Shall we define it as the religion which was revealed to man in Jesus? Probably there is no one professing the Christian belief who will not accept this definition; let us start from this then and inquire what that religion is which was revealed to man in Jesus. It must be, of necessity, his own religion; it could not be revealed in him unless it existed in him. What then was his religion—the religion by which he was himself animated and controlled? I submit to the candid judgment of every one who can read the story of that marvellous life with sympathizing consideration, that the religion of Jesus consisted essentially in this—devotedness to the will of God, as revealed in his own spiritual discernment. I submit this statement with full assurance that whoever will read the gospel story without prejudice, will find this definition of Jesus' religion abundantly confirmed. If, then, that was his religion, that is Christianity; and it follows that whoever cherishes devotedness to the will of God, as that will is in any way revealed to his discernment, he is a Christian."

Now we have the same objection to Mr. Buck's definition of Christianity, that we have to J. F. Clarke's (to whose definition we alluded last week). Mr. Clarke in effect says that every good man is a Christian; Mr. Buck says that "whoever is devoted to the will of God, as that will is in any way revealed to his discernment, he is a Christian." We object that these definitions are too broad for Christianity, and too narrow for the truth. Christianity cannot be defined as goodness, because the atheist is often a good man; and to say that the good atheist is a Christian, is to say what is palpably untrue both in a logical and historical sense. Christianity cannot be defined as devotedness to the will of God, because the heathen man who throws himself under the wheels of Juggernaut's car, or the heathen woman who casts her child to the alligator, are both acting with devotedness to the will of God, as that will is revealed to them; and yet we doubt if it ever occurred even to Mr. Buck to claim that these heathen are Christians. Charlemagne gave the Saxons whom he conquered the privilege of being baptized or put to death. In thus doing, he acted with devotion to the will of God and in the name of Christ; he was therefore a Christian, as Mr. Buck himself must allow. Some of the Saxons refused to be baptized, and were put to death. In devotedness to the will of God, choosing death rather than baptism in the name of Christ, were these pagan Saxons also Christians? To say that they were, would be to flout all sound historical judgment and the common sense of mankind.

Devotion to the will of God, as that will is individually perceived, is piety, not Christianity. It may or may not have any reference to the personal doctrine and example of Christ, and therefore may or may not be Christian. Christianity is a historical word, and has a historical significance. Piety is not such a word, and has no such significance. Piety is the general term; Christianity the specific: it seems to us childish folly to ignore such distinctions. We grant that Christianity has the elements of piety in it; but so markedly has Judaism, and so have the ethnical religions generally. Jesus was indeed devoted to the will of God, as that will was revealed to him; but in this particular he is not to be distinguished from the humblest heathen devotee who never heard his name. Why then should his official and historic name be forced upon the natural piety of mankind? We protest against it in the name of fairness and of truth. Shall the atheist because he is good, and the Parsee because he is pious, be unsuspectingly snapped up and carried off in the bag of the ambitious Christian? Let the Buddhist be a Buddhist, the Mohammedan a Mohammedan, the Christian a Christian, the atheist an atheist; and if they can all agree in being good, in being devoted to the highest, truest, and best which commands them, so much the better: let them be this without loss of such denominational identity as they may wish to preserve, while at the same time recognizing the common tie that binds them. The Christian has no right to snatch crowns from other heads, nor to insist on putting his label on other backs than his own. Let him wear it so long as he is content with it, and just so long we shall know to what great religious clan he belongs; but we beg of him not to be so unscientific as to attempt to prove that his one species is the genus itself.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on May 29, 30.

Thursday evening, May 29, session for business and addresses at Parker Fraternity Hall. At this meeting, the question of Radical organization, including that of forming "Liberal Leagues," will be discussed.

Friday, May 30, forenoon and afternoon, Convention for essays and addresses in Tremont Temple. On Friday evening, a Social Subscription Festival is to be held, at which there will also be brief speeches.

A specially attractive Convention, having new features of interest, is anticipated. Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the Boston papers.

WM. J. POTTER,

The New York East Conference of Methodists is a very funny body. They not only require that their ministers shall not speak "too long nor too loud," but also that they shall not allow themselves to become over forty-two years of age, nor their children to increase to the number of eight! A certain Rev. David McMullen, member of this Conference, had by some unaccountable means, allowed himself to transgress these latter requirements; and so the Conference, at its late session in Harlem, proposed to "discontinue" him. It would seem that he was commendable in all other respects, only—"he was forty-two years old, and happened to be blessed with a family of eight children!" When it was proposed, for this reason, to discontinue him, some of the more wise and just ones in the Conference cried, "Oh, shame!" But it was thought by others that Mr. McMullen, "at such an age, and with such a large family, would entail unnecessary expenses on the Conference;" and it was only after a long discussion, and by the most strenuous exertions of his friends, that Mr. M. was "continued on trial." This would seem to be a threat to him that he must stop growing old and stop having children! But, seriously, what is this good Christian body about? Are they not striking a blow at the "Christian institution" of marriage, and indirectly encouraging celibacy, or something worse, in their ministers?

THE USE OF RELIGION.

It is well for the cause of freedom that not only Christianity but religion itself should be put on trial. Religion itself is not so important as the liberty of the human soul to develop in its own way; and moreover if religion cannot stand the test of human thought and experience, it has no right to exist. I believe that it can endure this test. And I here use religion not alone in the more general sense,—“the effort of man to perfect himself,”—but in the more limited meaning of a sense of special personal relation to the Supreme Being.

Probably I feel this the more, from having lived so long among the Southern negroes, when just emerging from slavery. I remember that one of the most enlightened women who ever went South to teach these people told me that they had taught her more than she had ever given them, because they had convinced her of the reality of the religious sentiment. Without admitting that I needed to be convinced of this, I can heartily say that they fixed the conviction more deeply in my mind, and that if I am ever led to question for a moment the validity of the religious sentiment, even in its ordinary meaning, I irresistibly think of them.

In them there was to be seen a class of people, suffering and injured beyond all others, and fully conscious (whatever the ignorant may suppose) of their wrongs. They had been exposed to all the corrupting influences of slavery, and to all the crushing influences of utter hopelessness. Yet, as a race, they cherished an unfaltering faith that the Lord would one day lead them out of that despair. As individuals, they had absolute faith that a future life would reward them for their sorrows here; and, in special bereavements and misfortunes, they showed a patience and a courage which came visibly and unquestionably from this same habit of mind. Making every allowance for excesses, for inconsistencies, for cant and for hypocrisy,—there still remained a solid reality of religious feeling which alone kept them from being a crushed and degraded race. It did so keep them; they proved that they were not crushed; nor were they in any profound or disheartening sense degraded. And I believe myself to give tolerable impartial testimony in saying that what had chiefly saved them, in my judgment, was the strength of their religious sentiment.

I do not say “Christianity.” First, because their ignorance of technical Christianity and of the Bible itself was astonishing. Secondly, because we see the same qualities often exhibited by native African tribes (as for instance in the beautiful prayers of the Gallas); and this especially when we get beyond reach of the slave-trade, which, sustained largely by Christian nations, has everywhere demoralized the “heathen.” Thirdly, because travellers testify to a great strength of religious sentiment as shown among Mohammedan negroes; and had Buddhism been introduced among this race I have no doubt that we should see it producing much the same phenomena. This may be inferred from the descriptions of the influence it has exerted in Tibet, Tartary, and Siam. It is clear to my mind that it is the religious sentiment, per se, that elevates and ennobles, and that the precise form of religion on which it sustains itself is a very secondary matter.

That this sentiment had yet to be disentangled, in these very minds, from much superstition, was clear enough. But I am firm in the belief that it represented a demand which is also to be found in the most cultivated minds, and which no merely scientific knowledge can ever replace; any more than science can take the place of the sentiment of human love. In the deeper experiences of life, the sense of personal dependence on a higher power becomes for most persons an essential; if I do not say “for all,” it is because temperaments vary so widely, and it is not safe to dogmatize in these high matters, or indeed to go far beyond our own personal experience.

These thoughts came to my mind on hearing the delightful music of the Hampton colored students, under charge of that true and noble man, General Armstrong. The music is delightful, because it renders the quaint and melodious “spirituals” of the Southern plantations—our only original American music—with the advantage of trained voices. There is infused into it, everywhere, the plaintive pathos of this long-suffering race; and this sometimes rises into touches of surpassing emotion. For instance, in the solo part of “Don’t you view that ship come sailing?” the question is asked: “Oh! how do you know they’re angels?”—speaking, merely, of the supposed passengers on board. The answer is wholly unexpected, original, electrifying: “Oh! I know them by their moaning.” That this jubilant race, in their very hour of triumph, should thus transfer something of their own grief to the heavenly band,—as if their very rescuers must have tears in their eyes and sympathetic sadness in their voices, as might well have been the case with those who came to save the sufferers from the steamer “Atlantic,”—this is an inspiration akin to genius. It illustrates the refining influence of the religious sentiment on this wronged and neglected race.

“THE KINGSHIP OF JESUS CHRIST.”

Rev. James Wallace, writing in the Christian Statesman under the above caption, very forcibly and clearly shows the supreme importance of the doctrine he discusses, as the key-note of the Christian Gospel. “Every intelligent and careful Christian reader,” he says, “may have observed a marked difference in the large and prominent place which the doctrine of the Kingship of the Lord Jesus Christ holds in the Bible, and the small and obscure place assigned to it in the creeds and confessions of faith of the Protestant churches.” And this “Kingship” he urges as not only spiritual, but political, binding all civil officers as such to obedience to his will, and embracing a universal sovereignty over all nations. Without flinching from the grotesque conclusions of these ideas, he declares explicitly: “The Lord Jesus Christ is as truly the King of Pennsylvania to-day as he ever was the King of Judaea. He is as certainly the King of these United States of America as he ever was the King of the United Tribes of Israel.”

In all this Mr. Wallace is strictly true to the fundamental conception of Christianity; and he justly criticises all Protestant sects for not emphasizing sufficiently this foundation of their own professed faith. But he omits to call attention to the fact that Roman Catholicism makes it the avowed basis of its own theology and hierarchy, and that it must in the nature of things support both the one and the other. Upon the Kingship of Jesus Christ Rome has erected by inevitable logic the vast fabric of the Papacy; Protestantism has only so mutilated the venerable edifice as to obscure its architectural design, and confuse the bewildered sectary as to what really constitutes its corner-stone. But Mr. Wallace has discovered the corner-stone of the Papacy in discovering the corner-stone of Christianity; and if he goes on to build upon it in consonance with the laws of religious architecture, he will discover to his amazement that he has reconstructed the Papacy, after all.

Admit, for a moment, that Jesus Christ is actually King of Pennsylvania and King of the whole United States. The people and the government agree to guide their national action entirely by his will,—not formally alone, but in earnest devotion to what his will shall really dictate. The Modoc war is the first business to be attended to. What shall be done with Captain Jack? Shall the United States exterminate all the Indians on the continent in retaliation for the Modoc massacre? What does Jesus Christ say about it, and what does he command? Every citizen of the United States, from President Grant down to the little dirty-faced shoe-black at the street-corner, diligently inquires what Jesus Christ wants to have done with Captain Jack and his fierce Modocs in the lava beds. Who is to speak for Jesus Christ and announce his mandates to his subjects?

There are plenty of self-appointed ambassadors from him. Every minister volunteers to tell you exactly the mind of Christ on the point; so does every religious newspaper; so does every independent Bible-reader; so does every champion of “Christian Civilization.” There are forty million voices and opinions in this country, more or less, about the matter. But President Grant has got to act. He cannot act on forty million opinions; he must act on only one. Jesus Christ is out of sight, and cannot speak for himself. President Grant must, after all, act on his opinion of what Jesus Christ decrees—must act on his own guess. Either Jesus Christ must directly reveal to him his own sovereign purpose about Captain Jack, or else poor President Grant is left to his own devices as completely as he would be if Jesus Christ were not the King of the country. But Jesus Christ is King of the country; and it is perfectly plain that he must reveal his own will directly in some fashion. He must have appointed some one with power to speak and act in his name, since without some such official representative he cannot be King of the country at all. Affairs involve concerted action, and concerted action involves a superintending mind in direct communication with the immediate actors. If Jesus Christ is really King in the heavens, he must consequently have his Viceroy on the earth; otherwise mankind are left to govern themselves in their own way, and Jesus is no King at all. In brief, the world must acknowledge a Pope, or give up the Kingship of Jesus altogether.

The necessity of an infallible revelation of the will of Christ which shall command with authority all human action as emergencies arise, without the uncertainties and delays of deducing this will from ancient books, is the stronghold of Catholicism; and in default of such an infallible revelation, capable of being instantly and infallibly interpreted, the Kingship of Jesus over the nations is reduced to a mere sham. Mr. Wallace has not yet emphasized his own doctrine enough! He gives us only a vague and valueless abstraction, impotent to affect affairs in the administration of government because we are still left in ignorance as to what is the will of our King, the Lord Jesus Christ. Unless Mr. Wallace can provide Congress and the President with some infallible expounder of the King’s will, such as the Pope of Rome, it is all moonshine to declaim about his Kingship. A King in the heavens must have his representative on earth, if his will is really to influence legislation and national policy. How is it, Mr. Wallace? Do you advise us to swear fealty to the Pope as well as to Jesus?

The associates of Mr. Butts, it appears, acted without his authority in appending his name to the “Notice” which they published in THE INDEX of May 3, announcing the transfer of their Index Association stock to other hands. All the transfer-papers had been already signed and delivered, except the one sent to New York for Mr. Butts’ signature; and they erroneously took it for granted that he would sign it. He now declines to join them in their action, preferring to retain his thirty-two shares and his position in the Board of Directors. My article of May 3 must be corrected accordingly.

F. E. A.

Thomas Smith was hung in Louisville, Kentucky, March 28. Like the other murderers who have been hung recently, Smith appears to have been “converted” just before execution. He was even baptized and joined the Methodist Church; and, in an appropriate speech which he made on the occasion, said “he was now ready to die, he did not care how soon; he was glad this thing [the murder] had happened, for it had taught him to look to Christ and make his peace with God.” It would seem that the more wicked a man is the better chance he has for being “saved,” something in the shape of a murder would appear really to improve his heavenly prospects! The Church delights in these hard cases, and undertakes them with unctuous alacrity. But what an impressive exhibit is all this of the absurdity of the popular Orthodox theology!

TYNDALL—THE "UNDERWORLD."

EDITOR INDEX:—

In Boston, a few weeks since, a highly intelligent lady told me of hearing the valuable lectures of Tyndall, the eminent scientist, and gave me a description of his fine experiments with the spectrum, and the wonderful colors produced. She said that his illustrative remarks were as vivid as the colors themselves, and that he said it seemed to him there was a realm beyond where science had yet reached, and where the most delicate chemical tests yet used failed, which was full of colors too delicate for eye to see, yet more beautiful than those flashed out from the spectrum—a world real as our own, yet not tangible to our dull senses.

A report in the Boston Advertiser is to the same effect, as it gives his words as follows:—

"The philosopher works with his eyes, hands, and senses; but does even more. This question he cannot answer without going beyond the region of the senses into a sort of underworld from which all phenomena grow. To do this, the mind must have a sort of pictorial power, and be able to form definite images of this underworld. If the pictures be correct, if the real phenomena are deducible from them, we have a physical theory by which they are explained. The formation of such a theory involves the use of imagination. This faculty must be invoked. Without it we cannot go beyond the mere animal world. The imagination is not the wild power it is supposed to be, but a power guided by cold reason. It does not leave the world of fact. Its power lies not in new creating, but in rendering facts fit to illustrate facts. This word theory is also much misused. We must theorize in order to rise above the animal world."

It is easy to see how the thought of this eminent man ranges out and goes beneath and beyond the external aspect of things; but might not a clearer ideal of what man is, help us all in this matter?

Man is a microcosm, made up in spirit of all finest elements and subtle powers of this "underworld," and made up in body of all substances and elements in this tangible and material world; all these finest elements and powers pulse through, and make up, indeed, his spiritual nature and organization; and all of rock or soil, of tree or fish or animal, ascends into and composes his corporeal frame. Thus is he linked to both worlds, touches and reaches all things, and nothing is foreign or strange to him. This "imagination" which "does not leave the world of fact" is rather intuition or deduction, and it is "a power guided by cold reason," or rather, when one intuits, reason and the inductive and external process of experiments come in and confirm the intuition, and thus is verified and established a solid fact, and the realm of science and the range of our common thought are enlarged. Truly we must use "imagination," or intuition, and theory, "in order to rise above the animal world," and we must do so because thus only can we act in view of our microcosmic being, and our wide and infinite relations. Let all scientists, and all theologians and students in the realm of man's duty and destiny, accept the use of "imagination," or intuition, and the deductive and inductive processes of thought and experiment will meet and agree and confirm each other, and a new Science, a new Theology, a new Religion, will bless the world. We shall be saved from the sceptical pride of logical induction on one side, and from the visionary enthusiasm of idle dreamers on the other. Bigotry will pass away, superstition be impossible, and the "reign of law," the presence of Infinite Love and Wisdom, and the spiritual fraternity of the race, will be known and felt.

But sometimes it costs more to follow an ideal than we know or count at first; and in this case this ideal of the use of "imagination" and "theory" goes into realms where even Tyndall has hardly explored.

I give an extract from the Autobiography of A. J. Davis, in which he describes his first clairvoyant experience; and his glowing picture of these bright colors seems like Tyndall's theory of the "underworld" made real to the opened spiritual senses of the clairvoyant.

Here again is this "imagination" and "theory" of the Life Beyond, these immortal hopes and longings that grow with the growth of humanity, as "The thoughts of men are widest With the process of the ages;"

and "we must not be so practical as to fear imagination." In this case come the facts of spiritual presence and intercourse; and a host of critical and careful persons have tested them by "cold reason," and they stand, and thus imagination and reason meet and confirm the grand and inspiring fact! The world's thought moves on beyond the limits of old theology and the narrow bounds and exploded theories of the ancient science, and its faith leads either to an external and inductive materialism, or to a rational spiritualism. Tyndall has entered the path which leads to the latter, and travelled well a little distance. He will find as he goes on (as will many others) the facts of the existence and presence of our friends beyond the grave meeting him for examination and solution.

We can afford to wait, for we shall win at last, and Tyndall and others, of course, can take their own time for this question; only it were well and wise to examine a matter that has awakened more thought and careful examination than anything else of that kind for the last twenty years. So far, the few words this scientist has spoken of spiritual phenomena have not been candid or fair; but it is to be hoped he is growing to a better spirit. If not, he will but harm and dwarf himself.

But I extract from the clairvoyant experience of Mr. Davis, as given by himself:—

"In my ordinary state I had never seen an organ of the human viscera; but now I could see all organs and their functions. The whole body seemed transparent as glass. It was invested with a rich spiritual beauty. It looked illuminated like a city. Each organ had centers of light, beside being enveloped by a general sphere. For example, I saw the heart, surrounded by one combination of living colors, with special points of illumination interspersed. The auricles and ventricles gave out distinct flames of light, and the pericardium was a garment of magnetic fire, surrounding and protecting the heart in the discharge of its functions. The air chambers seemed like so many chemical laboratories, the fire in them wrought instantaneous chemical changes in the blood; and the great sympathetic nerve, whose roots extend through the lower viscera, and whose topmost branches are lost in the superior strata of the sensorium, appeared like a column of life, interwoven and blended with a soft and silvery fire!"

The brain was likewise luminous with prismatic colors. I saw each ligament and tendon, and membranous structure illuminated with sheets and centres of magnetic light, which indicated and beautifully set forth the presence of the spiritual principle. . . . The spirit of Nature and my spirit seemed to have formed a sympathetic acquaintance,—the foundation of a high and eternal communion! The properties and essences of plants were distinctly visible. Every fibre of the willow, or any of the mountain violet, was radiant with its own peculiar life. I saw the living elements and essences flow and play through these simple forms of matter; and in the same manner I saw the many trees of forests and fields all filled with life and vitality of different hues and degrees of refinement. . . . Beds of zinc, copper, limestone, gold, etc., arrested my attention, and each gave off diverse kinds of luminous atmospheres. Everything had a glory of its own! The salts in the sea sparkled like living gems; crystalline bodies emitted soft, brilliant, azure and crimson emanations; sea-plants extended their broad arms, filled with hydrogenous life, and embraced the joy of existence."

This must suffice, although but a part of this rich narration. Verily it seems like an actual sight of the "underworld from which all phenomena grow."

Yours truly,

G. B. STEBBINS.

PROGRESS IN SOUTH AMERICA.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Have you space for a few words from South America relating to woman, education, and religious freedom?

Mrs. Caprile (a German lady of wide culture and intelligence), who some three years ago went as a teacher from New York to Buenos Ayres, writes me from that city, Dec. 18, 1872, as follows:—

"I have gone through the second year of my work quite satisfactorily. The school I established held its annual examination the 18th of December, in the presence of the President of the School Department, the Inspectors and Professors, who expressed great pleasure in our progress. The city papers also gave their approval. It is a new thing here to see a young girl familiar with anything but needle-work and a little reading and writing. I hope government will grant means to enlarge the school that it may become a good college. It is in this hope that I have been struggling on with every kind of difficulty. But my ambition is to give a start to female education in this country, as I find no lack of intelligence in its daughters."

You know my religious ideas, and that I would never descend to any kind of dissimulation, even for a good end. After I had been at the head of this establishment a few months, it was asked if I were a Protestant. I answered that I did not belong to any sect; that my ideas about religious matters had nothing to do with my teaching, unless in helping me rid the pupils' brains of a good deal of nonsense; that if I did not suit them as I was, there was an end of our contract, as I was ready to retire. They were satisfied,—that is, the ladies who have the administration of the young ladies' school. From that time I have had no trouble. In the Orphan Asylum there is a priest to teach the doctrines—church-going, confession, and so forth; that belongs to the Interior Department, and does not come under my control.

There is, just now, an open fight between a few lady teachers and the School Inspector, about an order from the Chief of the School Department to the Inspectors. The teachers of primary schools were in the habit of going to church and confession with their pupils, in procession. The Board of Education considered that custom quite anti-democratic, and sent a circular to all the teachers under its administration, abolishing the abuse. This measure put the priests on the qui vivit, and a few stupid teachers were easily pushed forward to rebel against the authority. A petition signed by numerous ignorant women and children, headed by four or five priests, has been addressed to the provincial government, requesting the revocation of the order. The struggle has begun. I hope it will end in a victory over obscurantism. I will try to help as much as possible. Women here has more influence than in any other country. A great many benevolent establishments, girls' primary schools, and so forth, are under the direction of a Society of ladies who form a corporation under the immediate control of the provincial government. The President of the Society is a lady of great energy and intelligence."

Respectfully,

ELIZABETH S. MILLER.

"THE FETICH OF SCIENCE."

EDITOR INDEX:—

"T. W. H." in number 160 of THE INDEX under the head of "The Fetich of Science," properly criticises Buchner for his unjust description of the negro as a race, and subjoins his own warning against what he calls the "Fetich of Science." I am afraid "T. W. H." makes mistake as well as Dr. Buchner, except that it is of a graver and therefore more dangerous nature. Buchner erred; this nearly all Americans with ordinary powers of observation will confirm; they know too well who ought to be held responsible for the degradation of the negro. Buchner erred in observation, like many a tourist. I am sorry that, to his renown of a thoroughly logical thinker, he did not add the laurel of keen and careful searcher and observer. But "T. W. H." seems to be deficient in what nobody will deny to Buchner; namely, logic. Instead simply showing that Buchner's conclusion was based on an erroneous impression or observation, "T. W. H." calls it "science," and tries to make a bugbear of it. The method of Buchner was scientific; the result necessarily wrong because based upon erroneous premises. "T. W. H.'s" way of reasoning is thoroughly unscientific, illogical; and therefore although based upon a correct observation, arrives at a thoroughly wrong conclusion. His warning will confuse and do harm. There can not exist such a thing as a "Fetich of Science" so long as the object of science is truth. Science, because of its very nature, will correct all error of observation or conclusion, so long as men will keep their eyes opened and their heads clear.

Yours truly,

E. P.

FAIR PLAY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—Allow me to suggest as an amendment to the proposition that the name of Jesus Christ be grafted on to the Constitution of the United States, the following: "That the founders of other respectable religions believed in, in this country, have a similar compliment passed upon them."

Yours faithfully,

F. R. HOVEY.

NEW HAVEN, Conn.

EMERSON AND HIS CONTEMPORARY POETS. A couple of private letters from a party American travellers abroad, who have been the company of Ralph Waldo Emerson, have been furnished to The Golden Age, with permission accorded us of making the following extracts: "Feb. 19. On board steamer from Alexandria to Naples. . . . Among our first cabin-passengers are Ralph Waldo Emerson and his daughter. Their 'dahabiah' was lying Luxor when we arrived in the steamboat. . . . old gentleman has escaped sea-sickness. . . . busies himself with one of the Latin Class and with letter-writing. He smokes after a meal, and at all times is very affable." A letter from the same source gives us the following: "March 2, 1873. Hotel Crocette, Naples. . . . In the evening, when we were again at sea, Mr. Emerson gave us a pleasant little entertainment in the shape of some readings from poets, making selections from several with which we were not familiar. The old gentleman totally different from the grave philosopher had painted him as you can well imagine; the childlike affection and sympathy betwixt himself and his daughter is something touching. The easy, simple style of his conversation is in marked contrast with the heavy of his books, over which we remember labored (while boys) as we would have done over many pages of the higher mathematics. . . . expected, he does not place Longfellow at the foremost poets of the age, but speaks admiringly of Whittier, Lowell, and Holmes, says many kind things of Bret Harte's gipsies. To Tennyson he freely awards the prize. Speaking of Bayard Taylor's intended epic, Goethe, he took no pains to conceal his opinion that Taylor was not the right man for the task. I wondered that he did not undertake it himself as he is evidently a great admirer and student of Goethe, one of whose books he has constantly by him."—Golden Age.

"When Shakspeare wrote about 'patience a monument,' did he refer to doctors' 'patience'?" "No." "How do you know he didn't?" "Be you always find them under a monument."

FACTS FOR THE PEOPLE.

The Heene estate, belonging to the Brooklyn Benevolent Society, covering one hundred and fifty lots, with the buildings erected thereon, situated in the Sixth Ward, and worth not less than two millions of dollars, pays no tax. The annual tax exemption, estimated at the rate of three and a half per cent., is SEVENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Two hundred and thirty-nine church edifices in Brooklyn, occupying one thousand one hundred and one lots, valued at nine millions six hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and having an average value per church of forty thousand four hundred and eighteen dollars, are not taxed. The annual exemption amounts to THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THREE THOUSAND AND SIX HUNDRED DOLLARS.

Sixty clergymen's residences in Brooklyn, occupying sixty-four lots, are exempted from taxation to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars on each residence, in the aggregate making ninety thousand dollars. The annual tax exemption on this property amounts to THREE THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS.

The total value of all the land and buildings in Brooklyn devoted to charitable purposes, no part of which is public property, is two million eight hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars, on which not a dollar of taxes is collected. The annual exemption amounts to NINETY-NINE THOUSAND SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN DOLLARS.

The following table shows the annual aggregate of these tax exemptions:

Heene estate, etc.	$70,000
Church property	338,000
Clergymen's residences	1,500
Charitable property	199,715
Total	$311,405

In ten years these exemptions, without any increase of this kind of property, would amount to $5,101,650, and to $10,220,300 in twenty years.

The whole amount of these exemptions in favor of private property must be made up by increasing the rates of taxation upon the tax-paying portion of the community.—Brooklyn Union.

The Apostolic Times is responsible for the following:

"A Calvinist preacher out West applied to a gentleman to give him a lot on which to build a church, when, according to the report of the latter, the following conversation took place: 'I asked him if he did not believe that all who were unsound in the faith, as he believed me to be, committed sin in every act of their lives?' He said, 'Yes.' And if I should give you a lot for a church, said I, would I not be committing sin in so doing?' He hesitated a little, but standing up to his creed, he said, 'Yes, but I will share the responsibility with you.' I said, 'No, I thank you; we commit sin fast enough without being urged to it by ministers; I think I will not do it.'"

The solicitor was not sharp, or he would have reminded the gentleman that he would sin quite as much in refusing to give as in giving; and since all he did was sin, he might as well sin in a benevolent direction.—Christian Standard.

A Chinaman was summoned as a witness in New York, the other day, and, to ascertain his views on the nature of an oath, the judge asked him what would be his punishment if he should swear to lie. "I shall never return to China, but always remain in New York," was the reply, and he was at once sworn.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

ON TRIAL AT HALF PRICE.—The SCIENCE OF TESTS will be sent to every reader of THE INDEX three months on TRIAL for 25 cents, that it may have a chance to try it. Address at No. 389 Broadway, New York.

THE LITTLE BOUQUET.

The Little Bouquet is the name of a Magazine for Children and Youth to be issued by the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House of Chicago. The well-known ability of this concern ensures the success of this undertaking; and it will fill a want deeply felt, and heretofore unsupplied. See advertisement in another column.

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING CO.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FEELING-SUBSTITUTION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. D. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Swaver, Alexander Loomis, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of ten or more, 25 cents each.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age,—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toilsome attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address:

The Little Bouquet.

The above-named beautiful Monthly Magazine, designed for the youth and children, will be issued on the 15th of May, and will more than meet the expectations of the most sanguine Spiritualists and Liberals. It will be a work of rare beauty, and acceptable as a literary production every way suited to the times. Its embellishments will be appropriate and artistic. It will be furnished at ACTUAL COST, estimated upon a subscription list of twenty thousand for the first year.

Those who order and send FIFTEEN cents for specimen copies, will have that amount deducted from the regular yearly subscription, and secure the balance of the year for $1.35. The Magazine at regular rates—such as are charged on all similar monthlies—should not be less than $2.50 per annum. But it has been the intention of the proprietor, for at least eight years, to publish a magazine for the youth and children, that shall not only command their respect but their admiration and love. To the end that it might adorn the COSMOPOLITAN, the subscription price has been placed at figures that will guarantee it to the family circle of the most humble citizens in America and England.

Let us have orders for twenty thousand copies of this admirable work—THE FIRST OF ITS KIND EVER FURNISHED—to all with the first number. It matters little to us whether the orders be for specimen copies on the terms before stated, or for a year's subscription at $1.35—knowing full well that no one who secures a specimen copy will hesitate to send for it a year.

PROSPECTUS FOR 1873.—SIXTH YEAR.

THE ALDINE.

AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY JOURNAL, UNIVERSALLY ADMITTED TO BE THE HANDICRAFT PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD, A REPRESENTATIVE AND CHAMPION OF AMERICAN TASTE.

Not for Sale in Book or News Stores.

THE ALDINE, while issued with all the regularity, has none of the temporary or timely interest characteristic of ordinary periodicals. It is an elegant miscellany of pure, light, and graceful literature; and a collection of pictures, the rarest specimens of artistic skill, in black and white. Although each succeeding number affords a fresh pleasure to its friends, the real value and beauty of THE ALDINE will be most appreciated after it has been bound up at the close of the year. While other publications may claim superior cheapness, as compared with rivals of a similar class, THE ALDINE is a unique and original conception of taste and unapproached—absolutely without competition in price or character. The possessor of a complete volume cannot duplicate the quantity of fine paper and engravings in any other shape or number of volumes, for the time its cost; and then there are the chromos besides!

ART DEPARTMENT.—Notwithstanding the increase in the price of subscription last fall, when THE ALDINE assumed its present noble proportions and representative character, the edition was more than doubled during the last year; proving that the American public appreciate and will support a sincere effort in the cause of art. The publishers, anxious to justify the ready confidence thus demonstrated, have exerted themselves to the utmost to develop and improve the work; and the plans for the coming year, as unfolded by the monthly issues, will astonish and delight even the most sanguine friends of THE ALDINE.

The publishers are authorized to announce designs from many of the most eminent artists of America.

In addition, THE ALDINE will reproduce examples of the best foreign masters, selected with a view to the highest artistic success, and greatest general interest; avoiding such as have become familiar, through photographs, or copies of any kind.

The quarterly tinted plates, for 1873, will reproduce four of John S. Davis' inimitable child sketches, appropriate to the four seasons. These plates, appearing in the issues for January, April, July, and October, would be alone worth the price of a year's subscription.

The popular feature of a continuously illustrated "Christmas" number will be continued.

To possess such a valuable epitome of the art world, at a cost so trifling, will command the subscriptions of thousands in every section of the country; but, as the usefulness and attractions of THE ALDINE can be enhanced, in proportion to the increase of its supporters, the publishers propose to make "assurances doubly sure" by the following unparalleled offer of PREMIUM CHROMOS FOR 1873. Every subscriber to THE ALDINE who pays in advance for the year 1873, will receive, without additional charge, a pair of beautiful oil chromos, after J. J. Hill, the eminent English painter. The pictures, entitled "The Village Belle," and "Creeting the Moor," are 14x20 inches—are printed from 25 different plates requiring 25 impressions and tints to perfect each picture. The same chromos are sold for $30 per pair, in the art stores.

As it is the determination of its conductors to keep THE ALDINE out of the reach of competition in every department, the chromos will be offered correspondingly ahead of any that can be offered by other periodicals. Every subscriber will receive a certificate, over the signature of the publishers, guaranteeing that the chromos delivered shall be equal to the examples furnished the agent, or the money will be refunded.

The distribution of pictures of this grade, free to the subscribers to a five dollar periodical, will mark an epoch in the history of art; and, considering the unprecedented cheapness of the price for THE ALDINE itself, the marvel falls little short of a miracle, even to those best acquainted with the achievements of inventive genius and improved mechanical appliances. (For illustrations of these chromos, see November issue of THE ALDINE.)

THE LITERARY DEPARTMENT will continue under the care of Mr. RICHARD HENRY STODDARD, assisted by the best writers and poets of the day, who will strive to have the literature of THE ALDINE always in keeping with its artistic attractions.

TERMS.—$5 per annum, in advance, with Oil Chromos free. THE ALDINE will hereafter be obtainable only by subscription. There will be no reduced or club rate; cash for subscriptions must be sent to the publishers direct, or handed to the local agent, without responsibility to the publishers, except in cases where the certificate is given, bearing the fac-simile signature of JAMES SUTTON & CO.

AGENTS WANTED.—Any person wishing to act permanently as a local agent will receive full and prompt information by applying to JAMES SUTTON & CO., Publishers, 58 Maiden Lane, New York.

See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Fall of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by U. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

MODERN THINKER--NO. 2.

The second number of this unique publication is now ready. The first number ran through three editions, and the repeated calls for a second number would long ere this have been gratified but for the pressing business pre-occupations of the editor.

The second number will be found of even greater interest than the first. There is, as all book-sellers know, a large and growing demand for scientific works of a popular character. But publishers so far have not dared to print all that science taught on religious and social topics. They feared to offend the Orthodox religious sentiment. The MODERN THINKER, however, was started to meet the public want and to give utterance to advanced thought without fear of consequences.

The following are among the articles in the present number:—

[FOR THE INDEX.]

On the Bible as the Protestant Basis.

BY PROF. F. W. NEWMAN.

In the great controversy which divided Europe between Catholic and Protestant, the clearest and most powerful minds on the Protestant side appealed to the Bible as the authoritative arbiter; and with excellent reason. The matter in debate was not whether Christianity was true and divine, nor whether the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were in harmony, nor whether the Scriptures were inspired and infallible; for on such topics all were agreed. The question was, "What is Christianity?" What beliefs and practices are Christian?" The Romanist replied, "You must consult tradition, and of that tradition the Church (i. e. the clergy, the hierarchy) are the depository and guardian." But the Protestant said, "Nay, but we must consult the Scriptures of the New Testament. You of Rome concede, you even maintain, that these are earlier than any other Christian documents; by studying them we learn what doctrines the apostles themselves taught; and if the pope and bishops claim to be successors of the apostles, they cannot or must not claim to set their doctrines aside and teach things new." The Romanist had no rejoinder, but that the laity were unable to interpret the Scriptures aright, and that no interpretation was sound, which was not sanctioned by the Church. To this Luther had his answer: "Bonus grammaticus bonus theologus;" which in such argument means: whoever understands Greek grammar well enough to make out what is written in the Greek Testament, may understand that book as well as any bishop. But to be more guarded against undervaluing the aid given by learning to the interpretation of ancient writings, it sufficed to say that the claim of an authoritative interpretation by the clergy was preposterous in itself; and much more when it rested on an alleged unwritten tradition, under the cover of which any superstitious and monstrous absurdity might creep in, and many had crept in, to the great damage of truth, piety, and morals. History shows how conscious the Church of Rome was that the New Testament was against her; for, so far as she was able and dared, she kept the book out of the hands of the laity. Down to the most recent years, no English traveller within the pope's dominions was allowed to carry in his portmanteau more than one copy of the New Testament in the Italian language; any second copy was taken away by the search-officers, on the presumption that it was intended for the reading of Italians. While suppression was the policy of Rome, publicity and multiplication of copies was the obvious policy of the Reformers; and no one who is not willing to run behind the pretense of occult divine powers communicated to Church-officers by the carnal imposition of hands, can hesitate to justify the appeal of Protestants to the oldest and acknowledged documents of Christianity. When the question was, Which shall we accept as the authoritative standard of apostolic teaching,—the writings of the apostles and of their personal coadjutors, or the later assertions of Church-officers? common sense lay on the side of the Protestant reply: We take the New Testament writings as our arbiter.

A minor difficulty indeed arose, when the Protestants so far tampered with the received canon of Scripture, as to exclude from it certain later Jewish writings, because, no Hebrew original being extant, apparently the Greek which we have is their original. This suggested to a Romanist the sarcasm: "So then! you decide by your own private judgment what shall be accepted as Sacred Scripture, and then claim to appeal to it against us!" This would have been a just and formidable remark, if Protestants had added to the received canon; but as they only took away, and what they took away was Jewish, not Christian, and no cardinal point of the controversy was thereby affected, the sole result of such a reply was to suggest a far deeper question, disagreeable to both the combatants—how either of them knew that the canon of Scripture (so called) was authentic, primitive, or composed by persons deserving trust so absolute. But the more cautious and thoughtful Protestants, in their appeal to Holy Scripture, were less anxious to impose belief than to claim freedom: hence the negative side only was dwelt on in the sixth of the thirty-nine Anglican articles; namely, "nothing that cannot be clearly proved from Holy Writ," ought to be accounted as necessary of belief.

It is not wonderful that those Christians who have no idea of a controversy with any but fellow Christians, have become accustomed to regard "the Bible" as the final court of appeal and actual arbiter of truth. I will here take occasion to advert to a doctrine of probability, in direct opposition to Herbert Spencer; a man for whom in external science I have a profound admiration, but with whom I find myself in perpetual and hopeless collision, as soon as he gets into metaphysics, mathematical philosophy, or history. He says that when two opposite beliefs are in long conflict, "there is usually something between them in common,—something taken for granted by each; and this something, if not to be set down as an unquestionable verity, may yet be considered to have the highest degree of probability." [Herbert Spencer, First Principles Part I, chap. i, § 11, p. 10.] On the contrary, when honest and able men, within the same circle of thought and literature, continue in fixed schism of opinion, the facts suggest that neither side has the consistency and energy of truth, or it would manifestly win upon its opponent; the great probability therefore is that they hold some false principle in common, which dooms both of them to internal contradictions. Hence, what they alike "take for granted," and regard as axiomatic, needs, above all other things, to be suspected and severely searched into, as the probable nidus of error damaging them both. Such is the assumption of certainty and perfection in what the Christian churches call Holy Scripture.

The three centuries and a half which have passed since Luther, have made enormous additions to European knowledge, alike in breadth and accuracy. However vast the erudition of a few scholars, who devoured indiscriminately all remaining scraps of Latin literature, before any European modern literature could compete with the ancient; however keen the zest with which the newly opened mine of Greek literature was explored,—yet even the most learned read with puerile credulity, or, if they attempted criticism, criticised childishly. The discrimination of fable from truth, in what passed as history, scarcely began before the end of the seventeenth century. Our Milton believed in "Brutus the Trojan" as the founder of Britain. Sound criticism of the classical writers of history attained no great perfection until the eighteenth century, and has been carried further in this nineteenth century, especially by the German Universities. The criticism directed to the detection of spurious books, or to decide on the age of literary documents, was quite in its infancy in Luther's time, but was soon discerned to be of immense importance. After attaining consciousness of power by much exercise on the literature entitled "profane," it gradually addressed itself to the books of Hebrew and Christian Scripture, with results which make the intellectual position of the modern Evangelical widely different from that of the Puritan two centuries ago.

The appeal to the New Testament is of course still open, in controversy with the Romanist; but the Romanist has ceased to be the principal or most dreaded adversary. He can no longer wield the iron arm of the State against those who reject the papal creed. France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Poland, Mexico, Brazil, all disown the office of persecuting for the Church; and while Catholicism is weak in the hearts of the cultivated laity of nominally Catholic countries, we see the clear marks of decaying power, however many isolated converts it makes from those Protestant churches which have retained some of its characteristic doctrines. The modern English Evangelical has to encounter objections and difficulties which the Puritan never met. The adversaries of the old Puritan admitted and maintained the genuineness and authority of the received canon; but the very first objection which meets the modern Puritan is, "Why am I to believe what you call Holy Writ, when it teaches something opposed to reason and good sense? What do I know of the writers?"—and, in fact, the intense study of the books by professors of Divinity is precisely that which has fundamentally sapped their authority.

The modern Evangelical creed has tried to discard all the niceties of the Trinitarian controversy, and in so doing has generally run upon something which of old was denounced as "heresy,"—whether by holding three or two Gods, as the vulgar; or by teaching that the divinity of Jesus consisted in an indwelling of the one God in the body of a mere man. To two Gods they have in general no objection, provided they be not called two Gods; call them "two Persons in the Godhead," and all is right. But the emphasis of the creed is placed on the "atonement by blood." When the devotee of "the blood" is asked from what Scripture he learns his doctrine, he naturally cites the Epistle to the Hebrews as his decisive authority; but encounters (perhaps with dismay) the objection that it is anonymous, and certainly is not the composition of Paul, as the English version dishonestly asserts. He thus finds he can no longer insist that the New Testament shall be taken as a whole, but that the task rests on him to prove, book by book separately, that each is "inspired,"—which is understood to mean infallible. To the ignorant some teachers will daringly or ignorantly cite as proof: "All Scripture is written by inspiration of God,"—words addressed by Paul to Timothy concerning the Hebrew Scriptures, before the Christian books existed or were collected; moreover there is fraud in the translation, which has foisted on us the sacred English word Scripture. Paul certainly never meant to say that "Every writing is divinely inspired," which this punctuation of the text makes him say; for scripture and writing are the same word in Greek. But, after all, why are we to trust to Paul's authority, when so many apostolic Christians were in violent controversy with him? Paul himself minutely informs us of his intense opposition to the Church of Jerusalem; which, as the earliest, and as presided over by the immediate disciples of Jesus, was more likely to hold the true doctrine of Jesus than Paul. He entitles brethren who belonged to the school of Jerusalem-Christians, certain false brethren, who had bewitched his converts by teaching them a different gospel; and bids them count every one accused who taught any other gospel than his. That these brethren were received as equals and coadjutors by the Apostle James and the other actual disciples of Jesus went for nothing with him. Indeed, how little Paul cared for the apostles he was most anxious that his Galatian converts should know. He minutely tells what a bitter public rebuke he had given to Peter; and concerning "those who seemed to be somewhat," that is, the three great apostles at Jerusalem "who seemed to be pillars," he declares that "whatsoever they were, it was no matter to him." Every chief epistle of Paul shows, more or less distinctly, the sharp controversy between him and the Church of Jerusalem, who are now contemptuously called "the Judaizers;" though they were the original Christian body and form the only historical connection with Jesus himself. That they were fundamentally opposed as to the doctrine of the Atonement, is more than indicated by Paul, when he gives such prominence to "glorying in the cross," implying that his opponents from Jerusalem did not glory in the cross: nay, he actually says they preached circumcision to the gentiles in hope of avoiding persecution for the cross. From the Epistle of James himself the "peculiar doctrines" of Pauline Christianity are wholly absent. That apostle makes true religion to consist in right acting, not in a right creed. The creed of the "devils,"—belief in God's Unity,—satisfies him without a Trinity; only as in the creed of Islam it is added, "and Mohammed is God's prophet,"—so in the creed of James it was contained, "and Jesus is the Lord." Faith, which Paul makes primary, with James is secondary: he sets "works" ahead of faith, and entitles those "vain men," who (with Paul) preached justification by faith. The Apocalypse also makes Jesus vehemently denounce those who (as Paul) approved of (sometimes) eating meat that had been sacrificed to idols; and the phrase, "those who say that they are apostles and are not," is (under all the circumstances) most reasonably interpreted as pointing at Paul. James moreover earnestly implores Christian teachers not to curse one another; on which we have a comment in Paul's curse on those who teach another gospel than his, and in his declaration that he wishes those (teachers from Jerusalem) who trouble the Galatians "were even cut off," which shows that if he could have struck them dead by miracle, or "delivered them to Satan," he would have done it. Thus, while we admit that at least the principal epistles called Paul's are genuine, and that, with the Epistle of James, they are the very earliest and truly valuable historical documents concerning the primitive Christianity, yet when the modern Evangelical appeals to "the New Testament," we have to ask: "To which school of early Christianity do you refer us for the truth? Do you dare to reject the authority of the Jerusalem church, as represented by James? Why expect of us more deference to Paul than that church showed him?"

Another grave matter arises, in regard to the Fourth Gospel. On it, side by side with Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Evangelical creed is founded. Not that epistle only fails us, and Paul himself, but the Fourth Gospel can no longer be rested on as authentic, or as of the first century. It is not quoted by name earlier than the latter part of the second century: perhaps it is quoted by Justin Martyr in the middle of that century, but he does not impute the book (whatever it is that he quotes) to the Apostle John; and modern criticism seems to have established that the Fourth Gospel represents the advanced opinions of the movement party in the second century, and has no right to be regarded as authentic or historical. [This whole question is very fully discussed in Thomas Scott's English Life of Jesus.] Next, since neither Paul nor James alludes to miracles wrought by Jesus, even the first three gospels must probably have incorporated later fabulous accounts; and that they are not contemporary records, there is overwhelming evidence. Clearly, the appeal to the New Testament as decisive of the mind of Jesus is not at all an easy and certain procedure. Moreover, the question arises, Why did Jesus leave us to guess and puzzle out what doctrine he came to teach? Could he have failed to give us authentic documents, had he foreseen at all the fatal mischiefs to follow from the neglect?

Upon all this heap of contrariety, improbability, and uncertainty, follow direct attacks made by modern science. Evangelicism cannot cut itself adrift from the Old Testament. It wants the doctrine of the "Fall" from Genesis; it wants the promises to Abraham; it wants the kingship of David's family; it wants the Messianic prophecies; it insists on the quotations of the Old Testament Scriptures in the New, as testimony from Jesus himself and the apostles to the inspired infallibility of the Old. The Bible, Old and New, collectively is the Protestant's Sacred Book. Yet there is no modern science which does not find gross error in it. Geology condemns its tale of creation and of the universal deluge. Natural history laughs to scorn the feeding of all the animals for a whole year in an ark, and that by eight persons. The actual distribution of animals on the earth proves that they never proceeded from a single centre in Armenia. Chronology confutes the notes of time in the book of Genesis. Professors of languages cannot believe that men talked one language about four thousand years ago. Geography ridicules the four rivers of Eden. Physiology is aghast at the absurdity of demoniacal possessions,—a foolish mistake of the phenomena of epilepsy, mania, catalepsy, and other diseases; to omit many other topics. Astronomy cannot admit that there is a firmament in heaven and waters above the firmament; that evening and morning existed earlier than the sun; that the sun stood still at the command of Joshua, or went back according to the word of Isaiah. History confutes as false many of the prophecies, and not least that of the coming of the Son of Man in heaven before the generation had passed whom Jesus addressed; historical fact shows that all first Christians were under delusion as to this cardinal original gospel, which announced: "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand; the Son of Man is at the door." History further traces that the doctrine of demons, the Devil, and Hell as a place of fiery torment, was learned by the Jews after the Babylonish captivity, from the "pagans" among whom they were mixed, during the era in which, by Jewish and Christian confession, prophecy was mute. These "pagan" monstrosities were sucked in with the mother's milk by Jesus and his disciples, and are now passed off upon us as of Christian and divine origin. Historical criticism detects numberless incongruities, credulity, and even unveracity, in the historical books (so called) of the New Testament, and shows that the law attributed to Moses was unknown in Jerusalem before the days of Josiah. More formidable still, moral science reveals enormous error in the morality of both Hebrew and Christian books; although they are undoubtedly far superior to the contemporary national religions, which is the true cause why they superseded them. Eminently condemned by morality are those cardinal Evangelical doctrines—atonement by "blood," arbitrary favoritism, and the eternal hell. The doctrine of atonement, as noticed above, rests mainly on the Epistle to the Hebrews, which tries to base it on the Jewish law. Yet in that law there is no atonement for moral sins,—such as theft, violence, adultery,—but only for ceremonial neglects. The great day of atonement was for the errors of the people; i. e., for ignorant omissions of ceremonial duty (agnomata they are accurately styled in the Greek, Heb. ix. 7); so that the Jewish law is not to the purpose of the argument. Substitution of an innocent victim for a moral offender is an immorality not countenanced by the law of the Hebrews. Last, but not least, philosophy,—that is to say, cultivated thought,—finds it impossible to regard miracles, if miracles existed, as any fit proof of moral doctrine. Miracles, if wrought by a superior power, might be divine or might be devilish: man, as a moral being, would have to judge of their communications, and never could rightly reverse or alter his moral beliefs at their bidding. An authoritative dictation of moral truth through the medium of physical miracle is therefore an idea perniciously absurd. It is not necessary to press the vast attestation of experience, that all pretence to miraculous intervention is delusive.

Surely it is high time for those who value certain spiritual influences of Evangelicism, to base the creed on some safer foundation than "the Bible." In so far as that school holds something true and noble, its real foundation is the inner nature of man. Let them appeal to that nature boldly, and they will save all that is precious. By continuing to rest on an authoritative Bible, which is nothing but a congeries of small books, differing widely in age, character, language, authenticity, historical truth, good sense, and moral worth, they do but expose the precious gold of their creed to be burned up with its hay and stubble.

The John Bull remarks upon Continental politics: "Prince Bismark is carrying out with a high hand his crusade against Ultramontaniam; he is applauded not a little by liberal Protestants, but we suspect that the astute occupant of the Papal throne chuckles within himself at the manner in which the great German Minister is playing his game."

"We say nothing of the inconsistency of the line adopted by the German Liberals, because inconsistency comes naturally to every Liberal; but we warn the triumphant majority who are following Prince Bismark's lead, that they are preparing for themselves a terrible retribution hereafter. Whether in Germany or Ireland, the choice lies between Romanism and Atheism. The duty of a Protestant Government is, while strictly preventing any encroachment on the part of Rome, or the rights of the State, or of other fellow-subjects, to allow the Church of Rome perfect freedom to tend her own children as she likes. We may not, and do not, like her views any more than we do those of Quakers and Unitarians—but what can religious liberty mean if it forbids the inculcation of spiritual dogmas? Archbishop Manning's speech at Liverpool on Roman Catholic Education is mutatis mutandis what an English archbishop should say, and we believe does say, on distinctive Church-of-England teaching."

The Springfield Union says the reason why Professor Tyndall thinks so much of the Yale boys and so effusively accepts the invitation to lecture before them, is because they afford so brilliant an illustration of his views concerning the inefficiency of prayer. Probably they are prayed for harder and get salvation slower than any other set of young men in the country.—Amherst Student.

A young lady from Massachusetts has received from the Michigan University the degree of "Bachelor of Laws." A female bachelor was sometime a paradox, but in these days of progress there is no knowing how soon women may claim to be widowers.—N. Y. Evening Mail.

PAUL GOWER.

OF

HEATHEN.

If such were the feelings of Mr. Gower's children, it could hardly be expected that his sons-in-law would exhibit more disinterestedness. They displayed, however, a decent average of emotion, and were particularly affectionate and conciliatory towards everybody on the day of the funeral. That was solemnized with sufficient ceremony to excite the admiration of the street near the Hampstead Road, and to satisfy even the undertaker, an old friend of the family, who subsequently sent in a bill which might have done credit to an enemy. The body of John Gower being committed to the earth of Kensal Green Cemetery (the abolition of metropolitan interment forbade its consignment to the family grave at New Bunhill Fields—a supplementary nonconformist necropolis in the Islington-Canonbury quarter, now shamefully desecrated), the mourners returned at a much brisker pace than they went, to consume that amount of port wine and other refreshment which seems inseparable from such occasions, and to hear the will read. Only Paul and his sister, of all the grandchildren, were allowed to be present, as representatives of their absent father; the rest being temporarily banished to the little front parlor, where they ate oranges and almonds and raisins, and drank port wine, until they were released, looking very hot and sleepy.

The will had been made about ten years back, and was drawn up, sealed, signed, and witnessed with an exactness suggestive of the testator's original profession. It directed that the bulk of his fortune, amounting, in its various forms of investment (consisting principally of mortgages on real estate, bank stock, and shares in metropolitan gas companies), to twenty thousand pounds, should be equally divided among his children—upon their mother's decease; the unbroken interest being bequeathed to Mrs. Gower, "as long as she shall continue my widow,"—whereat the old lady could not repress a funny look, despite the gravity of the occasion. The share of any son or daughter deceased was to descend to his or her legitimate offspring—a provision evidently introduced for the benefit of Paul and his sister, as there were no other grandchildren in the same (supposed) predicament. Thus their father and his brothers and sisters inherited (prospectively) over four thousand pounds apiece. There were also some inconsiderable bequests to charities and humble pensioners: the portrait of Mr. Huntingdon, described in the first chapter, was presented to a chapel of the Independent persuasion; and to the Religious Tract Society a legacy of fifty pounds, on condition that it should undertake the editing, condensation, and publication of thirteen manuscript volumes, comprising a sort of irregular journal, extending over many years, in which the testator had recorded his religious experiences and opinions, and which the society subsequently declined as ineligible. Long afterwards, when Paul came to look into these volumes, he did not wonder at the decision.

The will provoked considerable natural dissatisfaction. The sons and daughters had secretly and not unreasonably hoped that their father's parsimony would not have been protracted beyond his existence; that he would have left them their portions immediately, of course excepting a handsome sum for the maintenance of their mother. They were not lacking in affection and respect towards her, but thought that an old lady of seventy and upwards might have lived very comfortably without so much money, of which they themselves not unfrequently felt the need; and that Mr. Gower would have shown more justice as well as natural affection if he had considered their claims and necessities. According to their dispositions and circumstances, all were more or less disappointed. There was, however, nothing for it but acquiescence, though the general feeling found a pretty distinct expression after the reading of the will; when, in fact, there occurred something like a scene, during which the old lady shed tears and strenuously denied having influenced her husband in his testamentary provisions, wishing they had been more in accordance with her children's desire and expectations. (At the same time, she had known them for some years and had never raised, or indeed thought of, the slightest objection.) After which there was a great deal of kissing and disclaiming, and the party presently broke up with many assurances of undiminished affection—which did not alter their real feelings concerning what had happened.

Subsequently, with the exception of Mrs. Gower's frequent visits to her lawyer (who was also her paralytic brother, of Manchester Street), and the necessity for the old lady's making many journeys into the city under the convoy of his son and partner, things went on very much as usual at the house near the Hampstead Road. It was, at first, very strange to glance at the arm-chair beside the fireplace, and to miss its accustomed occupant; to come upon trifles belonging to and identified with him; and to be, over and over again, reminded of what had occurred by, say Mrs. Gower's widow-cap—for we get reconciled to such bereavements sooner than to their small sequences; but days came and went and brought their inevitable forgetfulness of the past and acceptance of the present. And, as one of the consequences of her husband's decease and her own changed position, the old lady began to develop in almost an entirely new and a very unpleasant direction.

Hitherto the old gentleman's placid temperament had operated upon her disposition as an unconscious emollient, which cheek removed, her temper became quite irrepresible. Then, though she had never been stinted with regard to money, he always took care to hold the purse-strings himself: like all narrow-minded persons, he was fond of power, and its every-day tangible representative. He made a secret of the details of his prosperity, allowing his wife a weekly sum for household expenses; for exceptional ones, she had to ask and give explanations. The course is too common in English households to provoke objection; but Mrs. Gower never liked it, and had contracted, in consequence, that exaggerated idea of the value of money which, I think, pretty frequent among her sex, especially when they cannot earn it; and which, when combined with the fear of poverty, sometimes superinduces a meanness of which men are absolutely incapable. Now, after so many years of comparative dependence, she was mistress of the situation, and disposed to let people know it, her sense of self-importance naturally increasing with her inheritance. Again, it brought with it business-responsibility for which she was quite unfit, and which rendered her irritable; while her age and loneliness made her querulous. She had never been so fretful, so contrary, so capriciously despot, or appeared to so little advantage generally.

Once a not-ungenerous, if arbitrary, old woman, she became extremely sharp about money matters, distrusting the correctness of the various returns made to her of the property, if not the honesty of the senders; who, she thought, would be likely to take advantage of her, if not severely looked after. She gave her brother and nephew an infinite deal of trouble, and almost quarrelled with the latter. She never could be brought to understand that her late husband's fortune—the whole twenty thousand pounds—did not belong to her instead of merely the interest; and was mightily displeased when one of her sons (a country auctioneer and appraiser, with a large family, who would otherwise have been obliged to become bankrupt or emigrate) raised money upon his share; particularly resenting the necessary researches by his lawyer, whom she denounced as a fellow and a pettifogger. She snubbed her trades-folks and taxed their bills. She developed an extraordinary sensitiveness towards imaginary slights in not calling upon her, and was very uncertain in her behavior to visitors; sometimes receiving them grimly, sometimes tartly, and sometimes all but "sending them about their business." She began to like flattery, though it could only be administered at the risk of the flatterer, who was liable, metaphorically speaking, to have his or her head snapped off at any moment; but when persisted in, and all rebuffs put up with, it generally attained its end. She changed her opinions of people very frequently, going from one extreme to the other, and expecting everybody to instantaneously accept her conclusions. More and more she identified her own notions with the will of Providence; regarding dissent from either as equally impious. She began to make wills in behalf of her favorites, for the time being, and to destroy them. She gratuitously surmised that some people wouldn't be very sorry when she was gone, though she might trouble 'em for some time yet. Always rigidly Protestant in faith, her intolerance of Roman Catholicism now became rampant: she opined that "popery" was taking the terrible strides towards the spiritual enslavement of Great Britain, and felicitated herself that she wouldn't live long enough to witness that catastrophe; if indeed the end of all things did not arrive sooner—for the current advocate of that singularly novel and useful theory (which would exert such a beneficial effect upon human affairs generally, if it could only gain ground) found in Mrs. Gower a willing listener. What is more to the present purpose, she rendered Paul's life a burden to him.

Immediately after the decease of her husband, the old lady chose to assume, without the slightest warrant of fact or evidence, that her eldest son would, on receipt of the news, incontinently repair home from Louisiana to see his old mother; which rather arbitrary supposition postponed all considerations of Paul's intended voyage until his father's hypothetical arrival. On the young man's venturing to dispute this idea (which probably originated in Mrs. Gower's affection, increased self-esteem, and a latent recollection that differences between the dead father and son had indirectly caused the latter's expatriation), his grandmother was mightily offended; and the more so because Ruth shared her brother's opinion. Of her, however, the old lady always stood somewhat in awe, and therefore could not visit her with the expression of her displeasure; which, in consequence, fell in double force upon the unlucky head of Paul, after his sister's return to Northamptonshire. Taking it for granted that her grandson had no rights whatever that anybody was bound to respect, Mrs. Gower tyrannized over him so mercilessly that nothing but the knowledge that her time was short withheld him from open rebellion. It was all the harder to bear, too, because he had cherished a fallacious hope that she would be kinder after the death of his grandfather; that their common loss would soften the hearts of survivors one towards another.

"It's only a couple of months," he groaned to his friend and general confidant, Richard Sabin; "or I'd take French leave at once. It's like a jail," he continued, speaking of course of the Hampstead Road, "and as cheerful. I am always under ban for unspecified, unascertainable offences. Everything I do or say seems subject to an invisible inquisition, which is constantly on the watch to misinterpret and condemn me, and which admits of no appeal. Sometimes the old lady snaps at me, sometimes she only glowers or says 'Hm!' and retires within herself, as if my existence involved an outrage on constituted authority too grievous to be borne or thought of. And all for nothing! I never breathe freely in the house, and shall be glad to turn my back on it, for good and all. I'm sorry to say so, but it's the simple truth."

"I don't know why you should be shy of owning it," responded the Bohemian. "There's plenty of bosh talked about natural affection, which only amounts to a superstition when you come to look into it. If it exhibited itself by leading me a dog's life, I'd rather dispense with it altogether. I see no reason why consanguinity should be absolved from the amenities we expect from other people—why the fact of a man's being your brother, or your grandfather, or your father, if it comes to that, should justify him in making you miserable, or interfering with your right to do as you please. You weren't consulted about the relationship, and the obligation depends upon the manner of its fulfilment. But I never heard of a religious family in which the elders had any idea of common justice, or fair play, towards those whom they think Providence has placed in subjection under 'em—to be pitched into and jumped upon at their own liking! And it's no wonder, either."

"Why?" "Why? Don't you see that all their notions, both of this life and the next, are essentially arbitrary, and involve the pitch-forking of countless millions—by far the greater number of human beings who have ever existed—into such awful suffering, to all eternity, that anything they can inflict here, on their own hook, becomes a mere flea-bite in comparison? Can you expect much feeling, or regard for others, with such a belief? Then they are the elect, remember, and the rest of mankind miserable sinners; hence to dispute their orders or opinions is to be fighting against God Almighty. As his vicegerents they are bound to persecute you. Not to hew Ammon hip and thigh, and put the men of what-you-may-call-it into brick-kilns and under saws and harrows, is a sin, you know. Weren't the Jews a chosen people, and didn't they walk into the Philistines? It's just the same spirit nowadays, only adapted to the nineteenth century. Wherever you find a class of people who live within a peculiarly narrow range of ideas and think they've got a monopoly of God's goodness, to the exclusion of everybody else, be sure they'll be selfish and hard-natured, and make themselves the paramount consideration in everything. And when they've gone on doing this to three-score-and-ten, there's no changing 'em. You'd have to resolve the old lady into her original elements—perhaps to unmake her for several generations—to get it out of her. Why didn't you hit back, years ago?"

"I did, once," Paul truthfully answered. "It was just before I was article to Sam, when I lived entirely at home and was particularly miserable. I wrote a letter to my grandfather asking for a lodging out and separate maintenance until I should be one-and-twenty, when I'd shift for myself. It really produced some impression and temporarily improved my condition, though they affected astonishment and horror at it."

If we think of religion only as a means of escaping what we call the wrath to come, we shall not escape it; we are already under it; we are under the burden of death, for we care only for ourselves.—James Anthony Froude.

The Sanctuary of Superstition.

TRIED BY IT.—Never open the Word of God without remembering that you must be tried by it at the judgment seat of Christ.—Sunday Republic.

STOP DANCING.—Stop! You are on dangerous ground! You, a member of the church and a dancer! Do you dance "in the name of the Lord Jesus?" (See Col. iii. 17.) "Revelings" (Gal. v. 21) embraces dancing. "They which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Fearful!—Gospel Echo (Mar. 27, 1873.)

UPSIDE DOWN.—For there is nothing that so interferes with sin, there is nothing so ruinous to every form of established iniquity, there is nothing that has such tendency to turn the world upside down, as our glorious Christianity. The fact is, that the world now is wrong-side up, and it needs to be turned up-side down in order that it may be right side up.—Talmage.

THE DEVIL'S FAULT.—When the devil had set enmity betwixt God and man at the fall of Adam, it was a lovely dawning towards man's recovery when God set enmity betwixt man and the devil, for their friendship had been man's undoing; but it was the glorious sun rising, or noontide rather, when God abolished the enmity betwixt man and himself, and brought and spake peace.—Lightfoot.

INFALLIBLE.—The Bible is a veil of pure gold, unalloyed by quartz, or any earthly substance. This is a star without a speck; a sun without a blot; a light without darkness; a moon without its paleness; a glory without a dimness. O, Bible! it cannot be said of any other book that it is perfect and pure; but of thee we can declare all wisdom is gathered up in thee, without a particle of folly. This is the judge that ends the strife, where wit and reason fail. This is the book, untainted by any error; but is pure, unalloyed, perfect truth.—Spurgeon.

DAMNED OUT OF CHRIST.—How many awful texts there are in Scripture! They are like so many great glaring red lamps standing across a railway line where it would not be safe to advance. People think that these texts make God out to be unkind. The opposite is true. God is kind and merciful, but he is not merciful to sin. If we die out of Christ, we must be damned; therefore in love God makes these awful warning texts gleam across our path to stop us in our hellward course, that the great day of his wrath come not upon us unawares. Many shut their eyes, and thus have been given over to "strong delusion that they should believe a lie that they might be damned who believed not the truth."—Sunday Republic.

THE CRACK OF DOOM.—Beyond the possibility of a doubt we are now in close proximity to the final destiny of the human race. All the symbolic and prophetic arrangements seem to point to these eventful days. I often in surveying our surroundings think that, could I have been permitted to stand beside Adam, and with the ken of a prophet been permitted to view the onward rolling ages, and then close an existence the most pregnant with stupendous events, it seems that the present would have been my desire. The scoffing and taunting of multitudes of the so-called "Reverends" of the present time, against the speedy coming of Christ and those that do teach it, has served to close both the eyes and ears of multitudes, and array them in a lesser or greater degree in opposition against the merciful design of the Almighty, which doubtless was to extend a gracious, saving influence as far as the warning and the invitation should be sounded; concerning which the apostle declares—"Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world." Omens hang in gloomy portents o'er all the universe. Unrest, famine, pestilence, and multifarious plagues, with old earth's groaning and shaking fits, signify the destiny soon to come. Pilgrims, lift up your heads! The light of eternal day will soon burst in all its perpetual and immortal realities to the pure in heart.

As ever, a pilgrim wending homeward, S. S. BREWER.—World's Crisis (Boston, Jan. 1, 1873).

NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS TO INDEX STOCK.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Second Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held on Saturday, June 7, at 2½ P. M., in the office of THE INDEX, No 112 St. Clair street, Toledo.

Death has reaped a large harvest lately of great and distinguished men.

When such men as John Stuart Mill die, it is difficult to believe in materialism, and think that such intellects are utterly snuffed out like the light of a candle.

The death of Chief Justice Chase is another great bereavement to the nation. Though unquestionably an ambitious man, he was yet a pure and honest one.

Two men yet remain to us in this country whom we hope death may long leave untouched. Charles Sumner, foremost man in spotless statesmanship; Ralph Waldo Emerson, preëminent in the realm of ideas.

Rev. Dr. Peabody—an eminent Unitarian clergyman—says that "true science and divine revelation cannot contradict each other." Exactly so; the reason being that there is no "divine revelation" except that of "true science."

The Catholic Telegraph says the number of converts to Romanism in London, during 1872, was upwards of two thousand. Can any other denomination show as great an increase in that city?

We learn from the Woman's Journal that Mrs. Julia Ward Howe is interested in the conduct of a "Woman's Prayer Meeting," in Boston, which it would appear she designs to use as one of the means for promoting the cause of woman's rights, as well as other reforms. We have no doubt that Mrs. Howe can be as eloquent in prayer as she sometimes is in public addresses; but we would respectfully suggest to this lady that the one to be petitioned has already made up his mind on the subject she has so much at heart, and does not need to have the pros and cons of the case presented to him by any woman's praying-band.

Rev. D. H. Clark of Northumberland, Pa., whose excellent sermon, "The Last Word," was printed in THE INDEX some months ago, is doing excellent missionary service for the cause of free religion in his part of that State. Having been obliged to leave his own church in Northumberland, for heresy to Unitarian doctrines, he has since lectured in various places to very good audiences, and acted as agent in the sale and distribution of liberal publications. The result of his labors can but be very favorable to the cause of religious freedom; and we wish also that they might accrue to his own advantage in permanently establishing for him a thoroughly radical society.

Since the issue of May 3, when so large a space in this paper was given to a discussion of THE INDEX troubles, it has been our firm purpose (adopted after due consideration) not to have the discussion re-opened in these columns. The case has been fully made up on both sides, and may well go to the tribunal of the stockholders without further controversy here. In the case of Mr. Hallowell, whose article appears in this issue of THE INDEX, we have only to say that he is a regular editorial contributor to the paper, and as such exercises the right which has uniformly been accorded to every member of the editorial staff of THE INDEX, of at all times selecting his own topic and writing in his own vein independent of every other.

THE HEROISM OF MORAL FIDELITY.

We are truly glad when we can heartily agree with any of those from whom we ordinarily find ourselves differing. Our most cordial assent is given to the following from the World's Crisis, an Evangelical paper published in Boston. It says:—

"The aspiration for popularity in matters of religious faith should be nipped in the bud, for it is blinding and ruinous in its effects. Instead of asking, What is popular? let us inquire, What is true? . . . It is none of our business whether the truth is popular or not. It is God's light; hold it up, and let it shine. We want the truth, and the whole truth, if we incur reproach by advocating it. . . . Seek to advocate the truth in its simplicity, and in the loving spirit of its divine Author, without regard to its popularity or unpopularity. Love the truth for the truth's sake, and not for the estimates that men put upon it, or withhold from it."

There are just two great forces operating in the moral world: one is the force of truth, the other that of error. Between these two forces there is not the slightest affinity, but a constant antipathy. They never coalesce, and never compromise; the continual tendency of each is to annihilate the other.

Now man comes into intimate and incessant relations with these two forces. He cannot think a thought, say a word, or do a deed that does not involve one or the other of them. His life must be based upon truth or error, and its evolution must proceed in the line of the one force or the other. But it not infrequently occurs that error's way seems far easier than truth's; for though the path of the latter leads always to glory-crowned heights, it often is steep and rugged. Truth almost always demands that we make some self-sacrifice for her, but error is apt to lure us with the promise of speedy gain. Public opinion, also, is generally very unwisely discriminating as between truth and error, and most often is found leaning to the specious side of the latter. Men in masses are poor reasoners. Public conscience is something which admits but of slow growth. Prejudice and passion are the most potent motives with the multitude. New and great thoughts do not dawn on the people first, but on the individual. Inspiration finds freest flow in private channels, and the fulcrum of a grand idea which is to move the world is always the mind of one man. And it is for this reason that a nation is never quite ready for its prophet, but when he comes receives him with surprise if not with anger. Every new truth (or what seems new) has to grow like the new seed—through thick surrounding darkness and a super-incumbent, heavy crust of prejudice. The first apostles of a great reform are invariably met with a shower of stones or words quite as hard; and a devil-temptation is sure to appear to them and offer them great things—safety and popularity—if they will recant their doctrines and stop their work.

Hence, because error is so plausible and so alluring; because the public intellect is so unwisely discriminating, and the public conscience so dull of discernment; because the masses of men are more easily moved by words of passion than by words of reason,—hence it is that what is popular has so many followers, and what is only true has so few. Hence it is so hard for one who in solitude has made up his mind to stand for the truth, to do so when he faces the crowd that clamors against him and it; that so few are able to say to every big and little devil, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" that so many are willing to compromise at last between truth and error, and to try to establish terms of conciliation where there is and can be only eternal, essential antagonism.

In private life as well as in public these two forces of truth and error come to challenge and to prove us. How often it seems to us hard to do right and very much easier to do wrong! How often we hesitate before a duty, shrinking from the sacrifice it demands of us! How often the fear of opposition, of ridicule, of loss of worldly advantage, keeps us faltering in the path of virtue and stumbling over half-formed and uncertain purposes! How often this devil of fear, and those others of pride, ambition, and self-love, meet us in the desert margin of our unconsecrated mood, and tempt us with their siren voice to be false to duty, to the truth our soul loves!

We know not why it is that in public and private life God has made so often the way of duty to lead through struggle and sacrifice, unless it be that so he would educate us all to be heroic in our manliness and womanliness. Struggle brings strength, and self-sacrifice is the mother of heroism. If there were never any difficulties and dangers for us to confront and conquer, we should never acquire or develop any such quality as courage. It does not conduce greatly to self-respect to do right when all the way is easy, and every one stands by to smile and to approve. We most respect ourselves when we have met and overcome some obstacle, when we have trampled under foot some temptation, when we have laid a costly sacrifice on the altar of duty. It is very foolish to seek martyrdom, and disgusting egotism to parade the martyrdom that has been ours; but it is criminal folly and revolting cowardice to turn our back upon a sad-faced truth which needs our service. Let us cultivate no pseudo heroism by wooing danger and inviting self-sacrifice with braggart bravery and indiscreet persistence; but when they inevitably meet us in the plain line of duty, we will smile on them with serene courage and step on their necks with lofty scorn.

Moreover, we learn to prize that which we labor for and win with toil. The bread of idleness nauseates; the food which energy obtains, nourishes and strengthens. The truth grows venerable in our eyes in proportion as we grow faithful to it. When we see how much it ever has cost to vindicate and establish it, it becomes precious in our eyes as it is in God's. On the shoulders of a long line of martyrs the truth has been borne to its high place in the regard of its followers.

This then is the heroism of moral fidelity, that we never forsake or betray the truth because it is unpopular. If we are called upon to speak or to act for it, speak and act we must, kindly and lovingly, but firmly and perseveringly, though the rabble followers of error howl at us and try to destroy us. Let who will sneak and run, stand we! Let who will seek their interests elsewhere, ours are always where truth and right are: loss for them is gain; gain without them is direst and eternal loss.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association will be held in Boston on May 29, 30.

Thursday evening, May 29, session for business and addresses at Parker Fraternity Hall. At this meeting, the question of Radical organization, including that of forming "Liberal Leagues," will be discussed.

Friday, May 30, forenoon and afternoon, Convention for essays and addresses in Tremont Temple. On Friday evening, a Social Subscription Festival is to be held, at which there will also be brief speeches.

A specially attractive Convention, having new features of interest, is anticipated. Further particulars as to subjects and speakers will be given in the Boston papers.

WM. J. POTTER,

The great Brooklyn preacher has at last met his match in his own line. A man, styling himself "the Son of God," entered Mr. Beecher's study the other day, and for two mortal hours preached to the preacher! This was more of a good thing than Mr. Beecher himself could stand; and so he called a policeman, and had the pseudo "Son of God" arrested and taken to the police station, where the general conclusion was reached that the fellow was crazy. On the penalty of being declared insane, let not Mr. Beecher henceforth dare to extend his discourses to the length of two hours. We once listened to him in his own church, when his sermon very nearly reached that fatal point.

JOHN STUART MILL.

The death of John Stuart Mill could not but make a profound impression wherever the English language is spoken,—wherever, in fact, the light of modern thought has penetrated. His name has for years been before the world as that of the greatest creator of opinion in England, not only commanding the attention of every reflecting mind by the boldness, depth, and sagacity of his own particular views, but also stimulating mental activity everywhere by showing that it would be equally unsafe and unwise to leave unappreciated the general position whence those views were taken. Whether in political and politico-economical researches, in reformatory and ethical questions, or in philosophical criticism and the study of logic as affected by modern science, no one can justly regard himself as a well-read man who is not familiar with Mr. Mill's writings. It is safe to say that neither Sir William Hamilton nor Auguste Comte, perhaps the two most illustrious exponents in this century of the eternally dissimilar Platonic and Aristotelian tendencies under which all thinking has been aptly classified, can be comprehended or fitly judged by the student of philosophy, until the masterly criticisms of their works by John Stuart Mill have been read, re-read, and thoroughly digested. It is equally safe to say that no modern radical can without conceit consider himself thoroughly grounded in the principles of radicalism until he has made himself well acquainted with that wonderful little essay on "Liberty" which is a veritable gospel of human progress. And certainly no one is qualified to open his mouth on the great issue between utilitarian and intuitionist ethics, until he has mastered that superb paper on "Utilitarianism" which probably gives the highest possible interpretation to the moral philosophy it advocates.

In truth it must be confessed that one of the very few great minds of this century has now sunk beneath its horizon. But this is not the place to discuss the greatness of it in the regions of the higher speculation. In religious thought it is doubtful whether the world will ever know the exact position occupied by Mr. Mill. He was reticent, and, so far as we remember, has left on record no explicit avowal of his religious opinions on some very interesting points. But that he was radical in the extreme is proved by his advocacy of the extreme liberty of thought. His manly refusal to be catechized by the electors of Westminster in 1865, when a candidate for Parliament, on the ground that it was an impropriety to pry into the religious convictions of any political candidate, made a marked impression at the time, and did much to weaken the influence of intolerant Orthodoxy. The peculiar caution which led him, perhaps for the sake of promoting the general increase of freedom in religious thinking, to withhold the public avowal of his own special conclusions, by which side issues might be raised to the detriment of the broad principle at stake, was eminently characteristic of the man; but there was no tincture of either mental or moral cowardice about it. On the contrary, no man ever displayed more conspicuously the "courage of his opinions," when he thought the occasion demanded utterance.

While making the preliminary preparations for commencing the publication of THE INDEX, having been previously favored with some correspondence with Mr. Mill, I sent him a Prospectus of the new paper, with the expression of a wish that he would assist the enterprise with a letter to be inserted in the first number. His reply has remained unpublished hitherto, out of scrupulous respect for his preference in the matter. But now that death has cancelled the restriction, I think the readers of THE INDEX will be interested to know that John Stuart Mill wished it well, even before its birth; and accordingly I subjoin the letter:—

"Dear Sir,—You have rightly judged that I should sympathize with an attempt to raise the standard of free and unfettered discussion on religious as on all other subjects; involving necessarily the same unlimited liberty of disbelief as of belief. Whether that attempt is made by professing Christians, or by persons who do not take that name, it is equally welcome to me; so long as, whichever side they take, they are willing and able to do justice, both logically and historically, to the other side. There is nothing in your letter and Prospectus that tends to give any other than a favorable idea of the spirit in which you have set about your undertaking. But to come before the public as giving what would be sure to be construed, however untruly, and however contrary to your intention, as a kind of voucher or guarantee for the merits of the projected newspaper, would, as it seems to me, be only suitable in those who have much greater means of knowledge than I possess of the manner in which it is likely to be carried on, both in respect of opinion and otherwise. I am, therefore, unable to comply with your wish that I should write you a letter to be inserted in your journal, and must content myself with this private expression of my good wishes.

"I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

"J. S. MILL.

"F. E. ABBOT, Esq."

The United States, during the great rebellion, had no truer friend abroad than Mr. Mill. With the spirit of our institutions he sympathized profoundly, even to the extent of wishing the institutions themselves more faithfully conformed to it in practice. His word was ever for emancipation, for negro suffrage, for the enfranchisement of woman; and the above letter shows how thoroughly he desired also the absolute liberation of human thought. A great and mighty champion of progress, a pure, upright, and high-minded man, has fallen; and the reverence of a world attends his obsequies.

ANOTHER TEST.

The critics of the Religion of Humanity—if that be the name for the new faith that is dawning—take up positions which are themselves open to criticism, not from their antagonists only, but from all thoughtful men. One we remarked upon in our recent article entitled "More or Less." Another we find in a well-written and candid paper printed in the last number of the Religious Magazine. The point is best conveyed in the reviewer's own language:—

"Our daily bread is taken from us, and not even a stone is given to supply its place. We are bereaved in our highest affections and our grandest hopes. That which gives its most affecting charm to beauty by making it immortal, and that which lends its highest inspiration to the heart by associating it with the Eternal love, are wanting; and bereavement and desolation, or insensibility and indifference, leave their fatal mark on everything around us."

Such a passage as this opens a vast field of discussion into which we cannot think of entering now. Want of space forbids. We cannot even dwell on the subordinate features of the statement; though we must vindicate them. The complicated assumption wrapped up in the sentence is such as all old, accepted, established, and therefore unchallenged, religions are chargeable with. Judaism urged against the primitive Church, Paganism urged against the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries, the same objections that Christianity urges against the teachers of rational religion. Rational religion, if it ever gets recognized, will probably urge the same objections against the unbelievers in all religion. The established faith takes itself for granted, deems proof superfluous. Of course all who receive it are happy and good; of course all who reject it are unhappy and weak. The least reflection shows that it is not a matter of course at all. The believers are not all happy and good; the unbelievers are equally good and equally happy, perhaps better and happier; but possession is nine-tenths of law, and sentiment supplies the other tenth. When the new faith shall have gained possession of a large domain of mind, it will have the same title to the same assumption.

The sentence quoted involves another assumption of a more serious character; this,—that the virtue of a faith is shown in its power to "give an affecting charm to beauty," to "associate the heart's affections with Eternal love," to chasten, humble, and console. But this is a matter that is open to discussion and doubt. If a "religion of sorrow" be needed,—as it certainly may be in some of life's emergencies,—it cannot be conceded that Christianity has a pre-eminence in that regard, over the Religion of Humanity. But neither can it be conceded without argument, that the crowning quality in any religion is its capacity to pacify grief, relieve loneliness, or subdue passion. Other qualities are admirable in men besides trust, acquiescence, resignation, gentle submission to the will of God, confident hope of future bliss. Other qualities are precious in a religion besides those which comfort. Christianity has displayed its genius—not triumphantly, but conspicuously—in soothing the human heart; the new faith must show its genius in kindling it. The world has been comforted too much; it needs to be nerved. Men have learned more than is wholesome of the Eternal love; they need to hear something of the Eternal justice and the Eternal truth. Courage, fortitude, self-reliance, manliness, readiness to accept the world as it is and take existence as it comes, to ask no more than is reasonable and claim no more than is just, are virtues sorely in demand among men and women. The "man of sorrows" must give place to the "man of joys." The time is coming, we are persuaded, when the test of a religion will be its power to tone people up to their duty, and make them exult in their privilege,—doing a great deal more than reconcile them to the universe they live in. Its work will be not to hush complaint, but to render complaint impossible.

But why should any sentimental test be required? Why should a religion be tried by its presumed capacity to console men, or inspire them, or to do anything else with them or for them that may be thought desirable? Why should it be an objection to a religion that it fails, or is likely to fail, in doing this, that, or the other service; in begetting a sense of righteousness or a conviction of sin, in bringing men under the promise of the divine Law or making them sensible of the heavenly Love? It is time that all this debate about gains and losses, advantages and disadvantages, should give place to a disposition to find what is most in accordance with the nature of things, what best explains the actual facts; in a single word, what is true. If a religion be true, that is enough; it will certainly lack no desirable quality that a faith should possess. If it be not true, if it exist by authority or tradition, whatever apparent recommendations it may produce will avail little to justify it. Sooner or later this must be the test.

A PROTEST—AN APPEAL.

As a Director in the Index Association I desire to record my unqualified disapproval of the action of some of my colleagues, whereby Mr. Abbot was compelled to resign the editorship of this paper. The vote of March 13 was equivalent to a dismissal of Mr. Abbot. I question the right even of the full Board to make such a radical change in the conduct of THE INDEX; and I am amazed at the audacity of the minority who, without so much as notifying us of their intention, passed this remarkable resolution. It was an act of bad faith to those of us who were absent. These men betrayed their trust.

I was not in the country when this wretched business was made public, but since my return have given it careful investigation. From a mass of vilification and personal abuse I have sifted the evidence, and from the ringleader's own lips have heard the charges and complaints against Mr. Abbot. And now I pronounce them absurdly frivolous, except where they are maliciously false. With Mr. Abbot's enemies it is "rule or ruin." I am satisfied that they plotted to control THE INDEX for their own ends, and finding Mr. Abbot unavailable as a tool, they determined to sacrifice him. I shall not use these columns to discuss the subject, and I would gladly hold my peace altogether; but I am remind that every one of my colleagues has spoken, and silence on my part may be misconstrued.

Friends of THE INDEX! If you would vindicate—no; Mr. Abbot does not need vindication—if you would rebuke dishonesty and incapacity; if you desire THE INDEX to prosper; if you wish to rescue it from its present peril and save it for the sacred cause to which it was originally pledged,—I appeal to you to reinstate Mr. Abbot, and to elect a Board of Directors who will aid and not thwart him in the prosecution of his work.

"TO WHAT DANE USES MAY WE COME AT LAST."

It is always dangerous to give a great man's name to an organization, for it may live to do something very inconsistent with his principles. The Channing Conference—composed of certain Unitarian churches in Massachusetts and Rhode Island—was presided over, at its late session, by Governor Padelford of Rhode Island, one of the two Governors who signed the call for the late "Christian Amendment" Convention. To hold to the principles of Channing, on the one side, and of the Church-and-State Amendment on the other, is a feat that might puzzle even a Rhode Island politician.

A PARALLEL.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The enormous expenditure for churches, and their freedom from taxation, has become a matter of considerable importance with those who cannot accept the Jewish Jehovah with his vanity and thirst for blood. That so many temples should be built and dedicated to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (for Jehovah never claimed to be the God of any other people) is truly a blot on the civilization of the present age. It seems that Christianity, in adopting this Jewish Deity, thought it necessary to accept the tithes he instituted for church and temple purposes; for did he not order his house at Jerusalem to be overlaid and inlaid with gold? Following this example, churches all over the Christian world are built to the tune of from five thousand to a hundred thousand dollars, and in Catholic countries they often reach a much higher figure.

But, while the Liberal press is very justly denouncing this great wrong, it seems to forget its twin-brother, Free Masonry, which erects its temples to this same Divinity, costing not only from five thousand to a hundred thousand dollars, but in many instances reaching the enormous sum of five hundred thousand dollars; and these Masonic temples, like churches, are exempt from taxation. Unlike Christianity, Free Masonry, with all its attendant extravagances, is run for men alone, and very often too at the expense of family interests—the wives and children of the members in some cases going without needful comforts in their poor homes, while the husband and father reclines on softly cushioned seats, or circumbulates on velvet carpets and feasts his eyes on finely-garnished walls at every turn. For the benefit of these "Sons of Light," The Square advertises "robes for High Priests" for five hundred dollars and upwards; Chapeaus for thirty-six dollars. Polard & Leighton, of Boston, will furnish a Crown, Mitre, and Turban, for forty to one hundred dollars; Breast Plate, one hundred dollars; Ark, twenty to thirty dollars; Incense Burner, twenty-five dollars; Manna Pot, two and a half dollars; Incense, and Red Fire, six dollars; Aaron's Rod, and the Burning Bush, thirty dollars. Many of the furbelows for this institution, denominated Regalia, are ornamented or embroidered with gold, and finished with gold tassels—all exempt from taxation. Surely the United States needs a "Dis-establishment!"

In this Order woman is classed with idiots and slaves; and in the old constitution we read: "No Mason shall debauch a brother's wife, daughter, or concubine;" thereby placing the three on the same equality—Solomon with his thousand women being their "Great Exemplar;" and no woman says nay! The Order is founded on the Bible, the "Great Light of Masonry," "God's inestimable Gift to Man," which must be respected.

Christianity says: "Ho! every one that thirsteth; come, buy and eat without money and without price." Free Masonry says: If you are a man, "with a perfect and upright body, having the use of your limbs as a man ought to have," with fifty or sixty dollars, and no enemy in the Lodge to blackball you, you can be initiated into our mysteries which "represent one under the doctrine of love, saved from the grave of iniquity, and raised to the faith of salvation." Christianity says: "Although your sins are as scarlet, the blood of Christ will make you white as wool." Free Masonry says: Although you have been "wandering in helplessness, darkness, and ignorance, amid the pollutions of the profane world, we will withdraw the veil which hitherto concealed Divine Light," "break the chains which have restrained you in moral and intellectual captivity," and "teach you to be nourished with the hidden manna of righteousness, to be refreshed with the word of the Lord, and to rejoice with joy unspeakable in the riches of Divine Grace."

Which is the greater humbug of these two systems? F. W.

HEALDSBURG, CALIFORNIA, Feb. 24, 1873.

FREE CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY OF FLORENCE, MASS.

This Society held its tenth annual meeting Monday night, April 7, 1873. H. H. Bond, temporarily presided, in the absence of the moderator. The report of the Executive Committee, by Mr. Hunt, chairman, referred to the origin of the Society and declared: "Our bond of union is simply to agree to seek after truth and goodness, and to agree to disagree in matters of opinion. In this brief but broad statement are found the talismanic words which unlock the secret of securing the strength of union without restricting freedom of speech, liberty of thought, and the rights of conscience. This plan of a religious organization challenges the closest scrutiny, and is a natural outgrowth, if not the bright consummate flower, of the reformation begun by Luther." The report spoke of the Society as prospering, recapitulated the speakers, and stated that the subjects embraced a wide range of topics, treated with that faithfulness, impartiality, and eloquence, which can be had only on a platform where perfect freedom of speech is maintained. The report also referred to the pastoral changes during the year; described the new Hall now in process of building for the exclusive use of the Society; alluded to the successful working of the Sunday School; and closed with pronouncing the Free Congregational Society a success, affirming that it had spread broader and more enlightened views, and promoted harmony and human brotherhood. The Committee say: "Is it not to our credit that we candidly and fairly hear both sides, while the sectarian churches allow only their own to be heard? Where the spirit of truth is, there is liberty. We encourage progress and scientific investigation. The defenders of the old religion say that some of their doctrines could not have been found out by reason alone. We believe it; therefore we go for reason."

The Committee, consisting of Seth Hunt, A. T. Lilly, and E. L. Hammond, appointed by the chair to draft resolutions on the resignation of the senior pastor, Rev. C. C. Burleigh, reported as follows:—

Whereas, C. C. Burleigh, for fifteen years the resident speaker for this Society, has resigned that position for the purpose of accepting a call to a new field of labor in the West, thus severing a connection which has existed from the foundation of the Society, therefore it is

Resolved, That this departure of a long-tryed friend and teacher is, and must ever be remembered as, a marked event in the history of the Society, and one which we cannot let pass without some token of our respect to him who is about to leave us. His resignation brings forcibly to our minds what has been done in the past to bring about the present. A feeble beginning, with strong opposition and wavering prospects, called for work of no ordinary kind, for a resident speaker with qualities of no common character. Both we found in our retiring teacher and friend. He has given to his work a wealth of reasoning, a nobleness of purpose, an integrity of life, which have gained us strength at home and influence abroad. He has labored to lay deep and wide the foundation of our organization, and we would here record our high estimate of his labors; and let it be

Resolved, That we would take this means of expressing our lively interest in his new work, to which he brings the enlarged experience acquired in the old, and to offer our united sympathy and cordial well-wishing. Also we would express our gratification that his home is to remain here, and we hope that this may keep his interests to a great extent still among us, and aid in cementing the close ties of friendship which have grown up with fifteen years' labor in a common cause.

The report was accepted, and, after further business, the meeting adjourned. S. H.

THE COST SYSTEM.

EDITOR INDEX:—

In No. 163 of THE INDEX I notice a communication from Mr. Benj. R. Tucker, of Boston. He lays it down as a fundamental principle that "cost must govern price," and infers that if any man obtains from any other man an article for less than its cost, he has stolen something from the producer. This doctrine suits me exactly; for this year my crop of wheat cost me a little over three dollars a bushel, counting labor and seed only. Now the whole community about here are trying to steal from me (unconsciously no doubt) a dollar and fifty cents per bushel on this wheat; for the highest they offer is a dollar and a half for what cost me more than three dollars. I am very glad to find an equitable man in Mr. Tucker, who will no doubt send on immediately and buy my wheat at cost price.

Now I have a neighbor who is constantly, after this fashion, stealing from me or some one else (I think it must be from me, for we have adjoining farms). Forty years ago we bought lands of equal quality, and commenced farming. From that time to the present, I know that in seed and labor the grain I have raised has cost me on an average one-third more than his grain has cost him; yet I have never (people are so inclined to theft) been able to get as much per bushel as he. Besides all this, he has (and with less labor than I have bestowed) so improved his land that, at the present time, he can sell it at least for one-third more per acre than I can. But the true rule is, "Cost should govern price." What business then has my neighbor with property more than double mine, when its "cost" has been much less? Plainly he is a thief, and has stolen it, unconsciously of course; but in "equity" he should now divide.

A CASE.—Two men buy equal quantities of land, and commence farming; in equal lengths of time they make a thousand dollars each. One so improves his land with his thousand that its yield is two hundred dollars a year more, over and above labor (or "cost"), than before; the other loans his thousand at six per cent, and gets sixty dollars a year. Now which is the greater sinner (of course they are both thieves), the one who steals the two hundred, or he who steals the sixty? But there is a third person implicated in this matter—the man who borrowed the thousand. He, like the first, lays out the borrowed thousand and makes his land more productive by two hundred dollars a year, above labor, than it was before; he too is another unconscious thief to the amount of one hundred and forty dollars a year! Or will you say that the first and last are honest men, and lay all the iniquity on the sinner who is content with his sixty a year, with the addition of risk, lost time in loaning, collecting, &c.? O logic, logic! thou art a wonderful thing—when chopped up.

UNBELIEVING ENGLISH STATESMEN.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—The following may perhaps be interesting to your readers:—

In England, time of James II., when the king was attempting to introduce that refined and beautiful organized system of priestcraft and superstition, the Roman Catholic Church, Middleton—one of the Secretaries of State, a man of ability, and, although hardly a free thinker, having no strong religious principles—was visited by a Catholic divine who tried to reconcile the Secretary's understanding to the mysterious doctrine of "transubstantiation." This proving ineffectual, the priest remarked: "Your Lordship believes in the Trinity." "Who told you so?" replied Middleton; "you come here to prove your opinions, not to ask mine." The priest, thunderstruck, retired.

Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, of the same period, was visited by another of the Mass-slinging and wafer-distributing fraternity, who attempted to convert him to the same dogma; but was sent off with the following remark from his lordship: "I have convinced myself, by much reflection, that God made man; but I cannot believe that man can make God."

The latter remark suggests to me Col. Ingersoll's lecture entitled, "An honest God is the noblest work of man."

Yours truly,

R. A. SKUES.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Feb. 19, 1873.

GOSPEL TINKERS.—For a certain woman whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, heard of him, and came and fell at his feet; and she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter. . . . And he said unto her, for this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter.—Mark viii. 25, 26, 29.

A Brooklyn popular preacher, preaching "the Gospel" according to Brooklyn on the above miracle, as we find in his valuable lucubrations recorded in The Methodist, holds forth as follows:—

"This woman was a mother, and she had an afflicted daughter. The child had a virulent, exasperating, convulsive disease, called the possession of the devil. The mother was just like other mothers: she had no peace so long as her child was sick."

What a pity the Lord and the Evangelists could not have enjoyed the privilege of "sitting under" a gentleman like this, who would have corrected their Syrian ignorance by informing them that what they called "the devil" was only "a virulent, exasperating, convulsive disease!"

The truth is, were it not for a few smart Yankee preachers, we might, some of us, ignorantly believe that the Lord Jesus Christ knew what he was talking about, and meant what he said!—Church Journal.

In science, read, by preference, the newest books; in literature, the oldest. The classic literature is always modern. New books revive and decorate old ideas; old books suggest and invigorate new ideas.—Bulwer.

NEGRO THEOLOGY.—The real, though perhaps unconscious creed of a vast number of persons is well expressed in the advice given by an old black man to a wild young Virginian: "Massa Richard," said this hoary evil-doer, solemnly lifting up his hand to emphasize his admonition, "if there is a hereafter, don't carry on; but," he added, suddenly breaking out into enthusiasm and a broad grin, "if there ain't no hereafter, carry on powerful!"

I am sorry to say that the young gentleman in question adopted the latter half of his sage mentor's instruction with a readiness with which advice is seldom received, or at least acted upon.

Talking of a future existence recalls the opinion pronounced upon his own prospects and those of his race, by an elderly mulatto man, the dining-room servant in a house on the banks of the Rappahannock. He was overwhelmingly genteel; and to see him solemnly retreat to the butler's pantry before allowing himself the luxury of a smile or a cough, made one quite ashamed to indulge in such demonstrations. He scarcely ever spoke; but when he did so, it was to express some decided conviction as to the inevitable destiny of his race in this world and the next.

"It's no use to tell me," he would jerk out in short sentences, "that white folks and niggers are going to the same place in heaven. Sure as you are born, there'll be a quarter built up for us to live in. And they'll have something for us to do. Why, they'll set us to pushing along the clouds if they can't find anything else."

Before the war, there lived on a plantation near Lynchburg an old colored preacher whose sermons were truly remarkable. One day his master, who happened to be passing, paused to listen to him as he discoursed to his fellow-servants. His subject was hell and its horrors, which he described in terrible terms, declaring that there was "whipping and whaling and snatching out of teeth." He then proceeded, with a touch of Dantean vigor, to tell his hearers that hell was a region of fearful cold, where ice and snow covered all things, and where freezing was the favorite punishment.

"Why, Cesar," said his master the next time they met, curious to learn why the preacher differed so strongly from the usually accepted theory of the infernal regions, "what makes you tell my servants that hell is a cold place?"

"Law, massa, I don't dare tell them people nothing else! Why, if I was to say that hell was warm, some of them old rheumatic niggers would be wanting to start down that the very first frost!"—Mrs. Seemiller, in Old and New.

JONAH AND THE WHALE.—A sceptic tells you that Jonah would have been killed in the process of swallowing, and that he could not, anyhow, have lived three days in such close quarters, but would have been smothered by the poor ventilation. How the good Christians immediately go to work and try to explain the whole thing by natural laws, so as to please the rationalists, and say that a whale is an air-breathing fish; that every little while it comes up to the surface, and that the whale that swallowed Jonah did the same thing, and thus got a supply for itself and for the prophet! Why not rather say that God can do anything; and he could take Jonah through the whale's throat although the throat would not have been half large enough ordinarily to let him pass, and could have kept him alive in the whale five years without any air if he had chosen to. Who made the whale? God. Then he could do anything he pleased with either of them.—Rev. T. D. Talmage.

The German Emperor has determined that the office of Catholic Bishop of the Prussian Army shall be abolished. The present Army Bishop Namszanoski was suspended for disobedience a little while ago. The Catholic army chaplains are now placed again under the Bishops of their respective dioceses, as before the last reign, when a special military Bishop was nominated in concert with the Pope.—Church Journal.

A well-informed writer states that there are within a radius of twenty miles from the Boston public library, and including that collection, at least 400,000 volumes in the dozen or twenty libraries which are open to the public without charge of any kind; and that in the libraries of colleges, societies, clubs, Sunday-schools, and parishes, within the same area, are also 600,000 volumes accessible to the public upon easy conditions. Thus a population of five or six hundred thousand men, women, and children, filling Boston and the outlying towns, are in possession of libraries which contain a million books.—Commonwealth.

The will of Napoleon III. has been proved in England. His personal property is sworn under £120,000; and this he leaves to the Empress without reserve. To the Prince Imperial it is said only one bequest is made—the Imperial Crown. The Prince Imperial is seventeen years old.—Church Journal.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age,—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toilsome attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows biting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address

The "INVESTIGATOR" is devoted to the liberal cause in Religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all discussions, regarding superstitious theories of what never can be known. It devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life only. It has just entered its 43d year, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, and dots, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader! please send your subscription for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the "INVESTIGATOR" is edited, we won't ask you to continue with us longer.

PROSPECTUS FOR 1873.—SIXTH YEAR.

THE ALDINE.

AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY JOURNAL, UNIVERSALLY ADMITTED TO BE THE HANDBOOK THEOLOGICAL IN THE WORLD. A REPRESENTATIVE AND CHAMPION OF AMERICAN TASTE.

Not for Sale in Book or News Stores.

THE ALDINE, while issued with all the regularity, has none of the temporary or timely interest characteristic of ordinary periodicals. It is an elegant miscellany of pure, light, and graceful literature; and a collection of pictures, the rarest specimens of artistic skill, in black and white. Although each succeeding number affords a fresh pleasure to its friends, the real value and beauty of THE ALDINE will be most appreciated after it has been bound up at the close of the year. While other publications may claim superior cheapness, as compared with rivals of a similar class, THE ALDINE is a unique and original conception—alone and unapproached—absolutely without competition in price or character. The possessor of a complete volume cannot duplicate the quantity of fine paper and engravings in any other shape or number of volumes, for less than its cost; and then there are the chromos besides!

ART DEPARTMENT.—Notwithstanding the increase in the price of subscription last fall, when THE ALDINE assumed its present noble proportions and representative character, the edition was more than doubled during the past year; proving that the American public appreciate and will support a sincere effort in the cause of Art. The publishers, anxious to testify the ready confidence thus demonstrated, have exerted themselves to the utmost to develop and improve the work; and the plans for the coming year, as unfolded by the monthly issues, will astonish and delight even the most sanguine friends of THE ALDINE.

The publishers are authorized to announce designs from many of the most eminent artists of America.

In addition, THE ALDINE will reproduce examples of the best foreign masters, selected with a view to the highest artistic success, and greatest general interest; avoiding such as have become familiar, through photographs, or copies of any kind.

The quarterly tinted plates, for 1873, will reproduce four of John B. Davis' inimitable child sketches, appropriate to the four seasons. These plates, appearing in the issues for January, April, July, and October, would be alone worth the price of a year's subscription.

The popular feature of a copiously illustrated "Christmas" number will be continued.

To possess such a valuable epitome of the art world, at a cost so trifling, will command the subscriptions of thousands in every section of the country; but, as the usefulness and attractions of THE ALDINE can be better appreciated in proportion to the numerical increase of its supporters, the publishers propose to make "assurance doubly sure" by the following unparalleled offer of PREMIUM CHROMOS FOR 1873.

Every subscriber to THE ALDINE who pays in advance for the year 1873, will receive, without additional charge, a pair of beautiful oil chromos, after J. J. Hill, the eminent English painter. The pictures entitled "The Village Belle," and "Crossing the Moor," are 14x20 inches—are printed from 25 different plates requiring 25 impressions and tints to perfect each picture. The same chromos are sold for $50 per pair, in the art stores. As it is the determination of its conductors to keep THE ALDINE out of the reach of competition in every department, the chromos will be found correspondingly ahead of any that can be offered by other periodicals. Every subscriber will receive a certificate, over the signature of the publishers, guaranteeing that the chromos delivered shall be equal to the specimens furnished the agent, or the money will be refunded. The distribution of pictures of this grade, free to the subscribers to a five dollar periodical, will mark an epoch in the history of art; and, considering the unprecedented cheapness of the price for THE ALDINE itself, the marvel falls little short of a miracle, even to those not acquainted with the achievements of inventive genius and improved mechanical appliances. (For illustrations of these chromos, see November issue of THE ALDINE.)

THE LITERARY DEPARTMENT will continue under the care of Mr. RICHARD HENRY STODDARD, assisted by the best writers and poets of the day, who will strive to have the literature of THE ALDINE always in keeping with its artistic attractions.

TERMS.—$5 per annum, in advance, with Oil Chromos free. THE ALDINE will hereafter be obtainable only by subscription. There will be no reduced or club rate; cash for subscriptions must be sent to the publishers direct, or handed to the local agent, without responsibility to the publishers, except in cases where the certificate is given, bearing the fac-simile signature of JAMES BUTTS & CO.

AGENTS WANTED.—Any person wishing to act permanently as a local agent will receive full and prompt information by applying to JAMES BUTTS & CO., Publishers, 88 Maiden Lane, New York.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER MILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

The Little Bouquet.

The above-named beautiful Monthly Magazine, designed for the youth and children, will be issued on the 15th of May, and will more than meet the expectations of the most sanguine Spiritualists and Liberals. It will be a work of rare beauty, and acceptable as a literary production, every way suited to the times. Its embellishments will be appropriate and artistic. It will be furnished at actual cost, estimated upon a subscription list of twenty thousand for the first year.

Those who order and send FIFTY cents for specimen copies, will have that amount deducted from the regular yearly subscription, and secure it at the balance of the year for $1.50. The Magazine at regular rates—such as are charged on all similar monthlies, to ensure a LIVING profit to the publisher—should not be less than $2.50 per annum. But it has been the intention of the proprietor, for at least eight years, to publish a magazine for the youth and children, that should not only command their respect but their admiration and love. In the cent half might become cosmopolitan, the subscription price has been placed at figures that will guarantee to the family circle of the most humble citizens in America and England.

Let us have orders for twenty thousand copies of this admirable work—THE FIRST OF ITS KIND EVER PUBLISHED—to fill with the first number. It matters little to us whether the orders be for specimen copies on the terms before stated, or for a year's subscription at $1.50—knowing full well that no one who secures a specimen copy will hesitate to send for it a year.

Truth Relative, yet Absolute.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

Nineteen hundred years ago, more or less, a young man stood before a Roman governor of the province of Judea. He stood in that presence to answer for the faith that was in him, and that was impelling him forward in a career of high self-sacrifice and devotion. In a moment of enthusiasm he had said: "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness to the Truth." Now the Roman governor would question him of that saying; and he asks, somewhat scornfully, "What is Truth?"

Ah, Pontius Pilate! were you aware what a mighty question you were asking? Short, indeed, and easy to ask; but how difficult to answer!

The young man heard the question in silence. He vouchsafed no reply. Had he chosen to speak, none about him could have answered it so wisely. The Truth was what he loved; it was what he came to speak for; its august voice commanded his unhesitating soul; and he stood ready to live or die for its vindication. And yet he kept silence when the Roman governor bade him speak and declare what Truth was. Why did he do so? Was it ignorance that held his tongue? No; it was wisdom, rather. He knew the Truth so well that he knew it could not be dogmatically defined. He believed in it, and yet he would not limit it with a mere word; his soul was fired with it, but he did not dare try to express it in a phrase. He stood only in the penumbra of its sphere, seeing but its dim outlines, and knowing full well that its orbit swept outward and included infinity; and his profound heart felt and knew that the Truth was illimitable and undefinable.

Hence it was that Jesus kept silence in the presence of his questioner. Hence it was that Pilate, who represented a power whose ambition it was to engirdle the world with its dominion, could not tempt this modest disciple of the Truth to venture any definition of that which his being was devoted to, but which he knew could not be bounded or comprehended. One of his last sayings to his own disciples was: "The spirit of Truth, that shall lead you into all truth."

And yet, what this wise and modest teacher did not presume to do, so many of his followers since have considered themselves competent to undertake. Have Christians in every century been backward, like their master, to attempt definitions and limitations of the Truth? When have they ever manifested any such modesty? The history of Christendom does not point out. On the contrary, we read how often Christians have assembled in councils, in synods, in presbyteries, to answer once and for all the question, "What is Truth?" As though it were some palpable piece or parcel of the earth, some scrap of a tangible domain or territory, these convened ecclesiastics have gone about to mark out and define the Truth, and to say it began here and ended there, and was bound so and so. And what is not less remarkable than the boldness of their attempt, is the unsettledness of its conclusion. These self-constituted surveyors and demarcators of the Truth have found it somehow necessary to keep their measuring lines always in hand; and though they have persisted in the rashness of driving down stakes, they have as often had to take them up again. The political map of Europe has not been subject to more vicissitudes than has that chart of doctrines which councils and synods and presbyteries have in vain essayed to fix and finish. For kings and emperors have not been more opposed and opposing than have they. Rivalries among would-be potentates of temporal affairs have fully had their match of rivalries among ambitious ecclesiastical sovereignties.

What therefore has been the result? The result has been that, though the question "What is Truth?" has found many ready with the claim of ability to answer it, fully and definitely, the answers given have not been more numerous than various and conflicting. The result has been that, though many bold attempts have been made to answer this question, it has never yet been answered; and the wisdom of the silence of Jesus has been fully vindicated. The question he modestly declined to answer, not only never has been answered, but it never can be. No man knows the Truth well enough to tell it,—well enough to round out its sentence of definition and finish it with a final period.

And what we say concerning this question, "What is Truth?" we may also say of that other question, "What is Right?" One is hardly more undeterminable than the other. That is, no man or set of men can be found who can answer either of these questions once and forever, for each and for all.

By some one it has been said that nothing which has at one time, and by one people, been regarded as a virtue, has not at another time, and by another people, been regarded as a vice. This is hardly an exaggeration of the fact. The conscience, like the intellect, of the human race has gone through many gradations of development,—must go through many more. And every stage gives a different standpoint of observation and judgment. Hence the standard of Truth and Right has never been uniform and fixed,—is in fact ununiformable and unfixable. There is no end—never has been any—even among one people, or one set of religionists, to the diversity of opinion as to what is True and what is Right. And when you take mankind all through, of course the standard of faith and the standard of duty will be found to be much more wavering and unsettled. The sea of human thought and opinion, like the sea that girds the continent, has ever been kept in continual agitation by counter-currents and winds setting and blowing, now from this quarter and now from that, changing the climes and the growths thereof, even of the self-same region, from frigid to temperate, from temperate to torrid, and belting the continent of humanity with hues and strata of many and various beliefs.

Now in consequence of this fact of the great diversity of intellectual and moral judgments among men, some have been led to think and to declare that there is no such thing as absolute, unconditioned Truth and Right, outside and independent of all human judgment; that these terms—Truth and Right—are relative terms, expressive of that which rests, not upon eternal and immutable grounds, but upon the shifting sands of individual opinion and sentiment; that, in short, there is no grand invariable system or principle of Truth and Right, by which all men's judgments are measured, but that every man makes his own truth and right as he goes along, and is accountable to himself and to nothing higher.

I believe this to be a large overstatement if not a perversion of the fact. Men do differ greatly as we know, but they all differ about something. And that something they differ about is the very eternal and absolute thing itself, to which all their various opinions and judgments are related. That this may become more apparent, let us ask why men differ at all in their notions of what is True and what is Right.

When two persons look at any one object together, they do not see it exactly alike; it bears a different aspect to one from what it does to the other. To one, perhaps, it seems a little larger than to the other; or a little more remote; or to have a different color or a different shape; or to be more beautiful. The impression which the object makes upon the two beholders is not precisely alike in any particular. Why? For two reasons: first, because the object itself has really various features and aspects, and appears different according as you view it from different standpoints; and second, because the two beholders look at it with different powers of vision and with unlike capacities of appreciation and judgment. One may be far-sighted and the other near-sighted, which will account for the object appearing more remote to the one than to the other. One may be more skilled in measuring the dimensions of objects with the eye than the other, which will account for its seeming larger or smaller to the one than to the other. One may be more ideal and imaginative than the other, which will account for its seeming more beautiful to the one than to the other. The object itself, however, notwithstanding all these differences of opinion and judgment concerning it, is real and does exist. It only presents different aspects to different persons, who look through different eyes from different stand-points. If both could look at it from exactly the same position, with exactly the same capacity of judgment and appreciation, it would present the same aspect to all.

Just so it is when two men or more look at any doctrine or action involving questions of truth and right—they decide about it differently. Why? Because (1) every such doctrine and action is more or less complex,—it has more than one side or aspect; and (2) because men's capacities are no more infallible and uniform in judging and estimating immaterial than material things. But the very fact that men so differ about what to them is true and what is right, is suggestive of still another fact; and that is that there is an absolute and unchangeable Truth and Right, of which we get these partial and various glimpses. When we look at a star in the heavens, we do not see the star itself, but only the light which comes from it. And that light is shed forth in rays which are gathered up into a focus on the retina of our eyes; and as some eyes gather more of these rays and some fewer, the star appears brighter and larger to some than to others, and to some more remote. Nevertheless, although on account of its distance from us we do not see the star itself, but only a representation of it; and although the representation appears different to one from what it does to another,—the star itself is a fact in the skies; it is there, complete, steady, and secure. So, when we look at the Truth with our finite vision, we do not in one sense see it, because it is infinite and high above us; we get only the broken rays which come from it, straggling here and straggling there into our small, weak minds, visiting some with greater fullness than others, according as they have the capacity to receive and understand. But although the Truth, because of its infinite proportions and our finite vision, does not appear in its completeness to any one of us; and although one gets one aspect of it and another another,—still, like the star, it is an absolute fact in the spiritual heavens, entire, perfect, and eternal.

Men, then, differ in their judgments and opinions as to what is truth and what is right, not because the Truth and the Right do not in themselves exist unconditioned and absolute, but for the very reason that they do so exist, and that men are trying the best they can to find them out, and meet with only partial success. The Truth and the Right are real and eternal things, independent of all human conceit and imagination; and men differ about them because the finite cannot comprehend the infinite, but must attain to it by degrees and slowly, and because men in looking at these things look from different standpoints, and so get different views of the very same objects. For though all men do not hold the same opinions about these things, every man holds some opinion about them. There was never yet a sane man, nor a race of men, but had some kind of religion and some kind of morality; but believed in something as true, and felt the sense of obligation to something as right. The light from the celestial orbs of eternal Truth and Right reach the souls of all, but enter and lodge in each with various degrees of fulness. Yet as the astronomer trains his vision to track the dizzy footsteps of the remotest star, so every man may come, by faithful inquiry and performance, to know more and better of what is perfectly True and perfectly Right.

And here it is well to remark that, as every object we look at, whether material or immaterial, presents different aspects and features to different beholders occupying different standpoints, it follows that no real and sincere conviction or opinion is erroneous, but only partial. Every religion and morality that ever was honestly believed and practised, has had some element of truth and correctness in it, because it has been one view, if but only a partial one, of the whole subject of Truth and Duty. So far as any church or any individual from its own highest standpoint reports its best view of what is true and what is right, so far I think it is to be received and accredited as correct. This, it appears to me, is an inevitable and logical conclusion; since no party or person can justly claim to know precisely and entirely what is true or what is right, and since also no party or person is wholly destitute of any knowledge of these things.

Error, then, both in belief and conduct, begins where sincerity and modesty leave off. For ignorance is not error—it is only an absence of knowledge; and no man should be blamed because he does not know everything. He should be blamed, however, if he claims to know everything, or is dogmatic about what he does know and what others do not. Socrates modestly admitted that he was the wisest man in Athens, as the Delphic oracle had declared, because, he said, there was not another in the city besides himself who was willing to admit that he did not, comparatively, know anything. And just here is the mischief, when men who know a little of the Truth think or pretend that they know it all. Some, as soon as they have seen a part of the Truth, straightway go and report that they have seen it in full, and condemn all others who doubt such concealed wisdom and prefer modestly to hold to their own. But the Truth is too large to dawn on any finite mind in less than an eternity of time; too large to be put into any given statement or formula which any man or set of men can make. The Truth is not only colossal but it is winged; it cannot be trapped by the most skilful logician and put in the cage of any creed. We must as followers of the Truth grow to its dimensions, and not try to limit it to ours. We must pursue the Truth forever, not clutch it or think to detain it in our grasp for a single moment. We should be glad that the Truth is infinite, and that we cannot ever know it in its fulness; for herein would immortality be glorious, that ever and forever we should go on to know more and more of the Truth. It was with this thought somehow in his mind, no doubt, that Lessing said: "Did God hold in his right hand all Truth, and in his left but the unquenchable thirst for Truth (although with the condition that I should ever and eternally err), and say to me, 'Choose,'—with all humility I would fall upon his left hand, and say, 'Father, give absolute Truth is for thee alone.'"

But notwithstanding there has been and is, and no doubt will forever continue to be, a great diversity of belief among men as to what is true in theory and right in practice, there is at least a tendency in all human thought and inquiry towards a common and uniform result. And the watchful eye can observe this tendency even when the air seems most to be filled with the sound of discussion and controversy. Though the solid ice in the river break up into many pieces, they upon the banks know that the course of the current under all is in one direction, and that it will take them all along to a common end. So, though mankind may be divided into numerous sects and parties and schools, those who stand a little aside can see that an unconscious but inevitable tendency is amongst them all towards a final unity of the spirit. The Absolute and Unconditioned, like a powerful magnet, draws all that is partial and particular into its own vast bosom. Even now we discern certain polar beliefs towards which all men are drifting; such as the unity and universality of Law which is intelligent and benevolent as well as forceful and invariable, the common brotherhood and inherent dignity of Man, and a destiny of eternal progress for the race if not for all souls. Inferior beliefs must yield at last and be swallowed up in the grand vortex of these. Already, indeed, the attentive ear can hear the timbers of the old ark of faith crack and groan, as their joints are being loosened by the subsidence of that flood of ignorant credulity which bore them on to the Ararats of their stately repose. And although many years may elapse before the hulks of old creeds will fall to pieces and their fragments be wrought into better forms, yet hope points to the time when a new and nobler race of beliefs shall spring up out of the Heaven-prepared soil of the human mind, and win all hearts and minds to loyalty.

In the meantime, every one must be true to his own conviction and faithful to his own opportunity. Steadfastly beholding the Truth from that position which from time to time we can best attain, we must never rest our feet on any point, nor be so foolish as to think we have at any time gained the end of the journey; but like the Alpine climber, we must fix our faithful eyes even on those heights among the clouds, and toll on and up, making the dreariest regions vocal with that glad soul-song which every day's new vision will put into our mouths. And never let us forget to hold our own truth in love and charity towards others, remembering that we no more than they are quite correct; that each one's honest interpretation is as true to him as ours to us, and that if we are all docile and truth-loving we may learn of one another and of God.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

IN WHICH RICHARD SABIN TALKS LIKE A HEATHEN.

"Of course it did. Resistance is the only thing that brings tyranny to its senses. When you get to Louisiana, I don't believe you'll find those niggers are the best treated who are always ready to take off their jackets for a flogging directly the overseer bids. Appetite comes with eating, and oppression grows with impunity. I never heard of a despot who was cured by his victims' ready submission to the bowstring. Try it on him and very likely he'll howl for mercy. He's generally a coward at heart and knows the right person to select for garroting, being apt to draw in his horn at the first show of opposition. Indeed, both tyrant and slave row in the same boat—are half partners in the business, and perhaps equally to blame."

"I say!" interrupted Paul, rather stung by the implication,—"you were praising severity the other day, or at least regretting that you hadn't come in for your share of it. Now you are talking like a heathen."

"Am I? Well, I never pretended to consistency. I dare say I had some sort of reason for my opinion, then. As for being a heathen, I've the common sense of mankind on my side, and their practice to boot; whatever may be their profession. And, individually, I go in for the sinners, and maintain them to be, on the whole, much better and kinder people than the rigidly-righteous, as well as the more agreeable folks to get on with. How did they (the saints) come by their current reputation? There's never smoke without fire, you know. The popular impression concerning them argues a fact, and a reason behind it. As for us sinners, I've often thought that our easy-going indifference to what is every day preached in churches and chapels is wiser than we are aware of. It shelves questions that we can't answer, and leaves us free to attend to the affairs of this life, of which we do know something."

"It is possible to be something more than a practical infidel, with a faith which is a dead letter," said Paul.

"Very likely. I'm only speaking of the two great classes into which mankind appear to be divided; and, for my part, am quite willing to take my chance with the majority. How many fellows I know who never trouble their heads about religion; live, as you'd say, entirely in the present, and perhaps commit all sorts of faults and follies—are, in fact, anything but moral and heavily-respectable characters, but possess so much of the milk of human kindness that you prefer them, infinitely, to the rigidly-righteous, whose very conceit of themselves renders them intolerant and hard-hearted. Are they not notorious for taking care of themselves? Indeed, it seems to me that their notions of religion are based on that very principle. Whatever else they profess to believe, the cardinal point is faith; which is so overstated and enlarged upon that they find it very easy to ignore all the rest—such trifles as kindness, and charity, and fair play, and common justice towards their fellow-creatures; which are only so many phases of self-righteousness and, as such, as dangerous as they are inconvenient. Therefore their creed, as a guiding and restraining principle, is next to worthless; and there's an inevitable discrepancy between their lives and pretensions. Do you think, now, that your grandmother is a bit the better old woman for what she calls her Christianity?—which is as like what I can imagine the real article to be as I to Hercules."

Paul's opinions so far coincided with those of his friend that he had listened to his peculiar ethics with a certain amount of sympathy; though he could not help wondering at Dick's easy dismissal of those tremendous questions which had cost him so much suffering; and which, even to revert to, sometimes wrenched his very soul. "So far as I can see, Richard," he answered, "your belief amounts to no more than condemnation of that of others, doing as you please and risking the consequences, because there's a great number of people to keep you in countenance."

"Well, I must confess that it is much easier to decide what you don't and can't believe, than what you do." After which remark, the conversation drifted into other channels, whither we need not follow it. It was the first time the young men had spoken together on the subject; and the occasion, perhaps, demands a little explanation.

I should give my readers small credit for observation if I supposed they had not remarked that conversations very frequently occur in life originating in some suppressed fact, which both speakers tacitly agree to keep in the background and avoid all reference to, though it forms the key-note to all they are saying. Such a colloquy was that just related as transpiring between Paul Gower and Richard Sabin. It meant, principally, that Dick knew of a certain quasi reconciliation between his friend and sister, and disapproved of it (out of good will to both parties); that Kate had been trying to convert her brother and only succeeded in irritating him; and that he suspected she might have had better fortune with the impressive Paul—who, Dick was persuaded, would certainly repent it. Hence his strictures on Orthodoxy and the Orthodox (which the reader will be good enough to take as coming from a Bohemian, and at whatever valuation he pleases), and inferential admission of opinions which he seldom condescended to subject to criticism. Ordinarily, as Paul suggested, he did as he liked, without caring to justify himself by any confession of faith whatever—even a negative one.

How did he arrive at the knowledge of the reconciliation? Very easily—Mills told him. Mills—discovered in an almost famishing condition on the first floor of a mews, in the vicinity of King's Road, Gray's Inn, where he had been just kept alive by the charity of a cabman, his landlord, whose three motherless children the poor drawing-master took care of during their father's absence—Mills, restored to Newman Street and his post of confidant and go-between to the lovers, revealed everything. And Richard Sabin, who really liked Paul, but, as we know, distrusted the permanence of his passion, could not resist the opportunity of throwing the weight of his heterodoxy into the opposite scale to that hypothetically plumped down by his sister's influence over her victim. "Though I don't suppose it'll be of the slightest use," thought Dick, both before and after the interview; "and the business must be left to die a natural death at its own leisure." Sabin believed in absence. His own feelings, though extremely strong for the time being, were seldom lasting; already he found himself very much less in love with Ruth Gower than he had been half-inclined to fancy; and had taken consolation in the very practical reflection: "What's the use? Most likely I shall never see her again—certainly not have an opportunity of cultivating her acquaintance. Besides I don't think I shall ever want to get married. But she was a beauty!" he concluded, with something like a sigh, "and I might have been quite a different kind of fellow if there had been a chance!" And, filling his pipe, he puffed away his temporary sentiment.

A few words as to the reconciliation between Paul Gower and Kate Sabin. Their meeting, on the night of his grandfather's decease, was, as a matter of course, the first of many interviews; during the greater part of which they made each other extremely miserable. For a long time Kate insisted in forcing upon her lover a discussion from which he shrank involuntarily, with the repugnance natural to all earnest and sensitive souls, when challenged to submit what is most secret and sacred to them to the certain hostility of others; and especially characterizing those who have suffered from premature wrestling with the same questions. Also from an instinctive conviction of its utter unprofitableness; and an irritating sense of the absurdity of a position which compelled him to talk theology while walking about the muddy streets of London, nocturnally, with a young woman who, notwithstanding his passion for her, had never appeared to so little advantage in his eyes as when shower-bathing him with texts of Scripture in the hope of inducing conformity with her own newly-adopted spiritual standard. But, at first, she would not be persuaded to refrain. Like all fresh converts she burned to show her zeal in proselyting: she had made her father go to chapel for two consecutive Sundays; had almost succeeded in quenching Tib; had attacked Richard, with the result already related, and nearly driven Frank out of the house, except at meals. What chance, then, had Paul of escaping? He sometimes went home (to be henpecked by his grandmother) in such a state of commingled desperation and depondency as might, at any moment, have blazed out into violent revolt and sudden flight, in place of the peaceful departure he had contemplated; the hope of which alone prevented such an explosion. Whether abroad or at home, he was equally wretched.

It might have been the perception of this, or the knowledge that she would soon have to part with and might never see him again, or a sudden revival of old tenderness, or all together, that presently wrought a revulsion in Kate's feelings. She was not so much changed, but that her impulsive, ill-regulated disposition occasionally precipitated her from one extreme to another. Whatever the cause, one evening, after they had been particularly miserable—insomuch that she wept repeatedly, and he gave vent to language which quite horrified her—there occurred a crisis akin to that ending their first meeting, and with a similar though more lasting conclusion. It was mutually agreed that the points at issue should be ignored henceforth or left to the solution of time; and that they were to love each other transcendently from the moment of reconciliation,—never giving occasion for future doubt, difference or suspicion. And Paul strove to believe that the compact made him prodigiously happy.

CHAPTER XXI.

"THAT NASTY, DECKITFUL CLERGYMAN WHO BEHAVED SO BADLY TO POOR, DEAR RUTH."

The return of Ruth Gover from London to Thorpe Parva, Northamptonshire, whither it now becomes our business to attend her, was accelerated by a communication from Mr. Blencowe, announcing that he had contracted a bad cold and sore throat; which mischance would, he very much feared, temporarily incapacitate him for the performance of his professional duties. This, to the old clergyman, was a serious calamity. He liked preaching of all things; indeed, placed most of his happiness in appearing twice each Sunday in his pulpit, where he often delivered such long sermons as rendered him amenable to village obfurgation as a "spoil-pudding"—a reproach commonly applied to such trespassers on the patience and appetite of their congregations in mid-England. He had formerly enjoyed some local reputation for his discourses, founded principally on his remarkable literal knowledge of the Scriptures: it was said there was no subject you could mention but he could cap it with an appropriate text from the Bible; and people had come as far as five miles to hear him—a compliment he never forgot; in fact it sometimes betrayed him into attempts at alighting his eloquence on unseasonable occasions, such as public meetings, visitation dinners, &c. &c. &c., where he had more than once been laughed at or coughed down. Whenever anything hindered his ministrations, he was particularly miserable; and so jealous of any temporary substitute that his parishioners declared he always selected the most superannuated, wheezy, infirm, incompetent old parson that he was acquainted with, or that Mr. Spackman, of Oxford, could supply (which is saying a good deal), in order to afford no opportunity for invidious comparisons,—though, to be sure, he justified his choice by the alleged difficulty of finding a young clergyman untainted with ritualism. When, therefore, Ruth read her guardian's letter, she was fully apprised of the gravity of the case, and went home prepared to administer the proper amount of nursing and sympathy. She little thought, however, that circumstances were about to re-open what she imagined was a closed chapter in her own history.

As Mr. Blencowe's apprehensions were more than realized, and he was so hoarse that he could scarcely croak forth a welcome to his ward on her arrival, there can be no doubt that he would have provided for the spiritual instruction of his parishioners in the usual manner, but for an event which furnished him, very much against his inclination, with another kind of deputy than those dreaded by the inhabitants of Thorpe Parva. This was a clergyman whom his friend and patron, the Squire, very unexpectedly brought home with him from the continent, where he had encountered him under rather peculiar circumstances; and, with extreme good nature and inconsiderateness, invited him to the place of all others in which his presence was least desirable, or at all events most likely to prove unwelcome. When Ruth heard of this gentleman's reappearance in the village, which he had quitted in a manner identified with the most distressing reminiscences of her life, and also that he was going to preach next Sunday—for Mr. Edgecombe had pressed his services on her guardian, who was, so to speak, constrained to accept of them—she was almost inclined to return to town. The reason why involves considerable retrospection.

The gentleman was, then, as my readers have doubtless anticipated, no less a person than her ex-suitor, the identical young clergyman whose quasi engagement to her, before the commencement of this story, has been more than once alluded to in the course of it; and, indeed, formed the subject of a conversation between the young man's uncle, Mr. Samuel Bligh of Soho Square, and Mr. Blencowe, as far back as Chapter the Sixth; or, to speak more precisely, a chance reference to the affair on the part of the architect, provoked Ruth's guardian into a rather peevish but not entirely gratuitous vindication of himself and his ward, as therein recorded. The circumstances, related with no

The Reverend George Bligh was a young man whose good looks, good manners, and general social accomplishments, to say nothing of his paternity and expectations, had, during his former sojourn at Thorpe Parva, created quite a sensation in the parish, and rendered him an object of unusual interest and admiration with that sex which is notoriously prone to identify its maximum of matrimonial eligibility with his profession. He might, in fact, have served for a girl's beau idéal of it; though he was, perhaps, too vivacious and pronounced a person for a clergyman, and could hardly have been mistaken for a mere ladies' man or pet parson. He had fine dark eyes, stylish features, and beautiful, black, glossy whiskers, curling crisply on each side of his somewhat square-set chin and handsome white throat (he wore rather low-necked cravats); also wavy hair which looked even blacker than his whiskers—not parted in the middle, or Mr. Blencowe would undoubtedly have suspected him of high-church proclivities, but unexceptionably (not to say evangelically) on one side. His voice was deep and carefully modulated, and he preached with so much good taste that with most people it passed muster for eloquence; and he could be even more agreeable over the dinner-table, or in the drawing-room than in the pulpit. His manners exhibited that easy self-possession which springs from familiarity with good society and a consciousness of the ability to please; while his natural quickness of perception enabled him to adapt himself to most audiences with readier facility than the majority of English clergymen, in whom may generally be detected a distinct consciousness of their cloth, notwithstanding their deserved reputation of freedom from professional priggishness—and in some instances an involuntary expectation of deference which forbids confidence and cordiality. Perhaps Mr. Bligh occasionally erred in the other direction, for there were those who thought him too agreeable to be very sincere, and distrusted that his winning qualities originated in mere approbation—the love of shining—and partook rather of the nature of flowers than fruit; but such critics were very likely jealous of his success with the ladies, and necessarily quite in the minority at Thorpe Parva, with the simple inhabitants of which he soon became prodigiously popular. Nor did they like him any the less for a tradition that he had been rather "gay" at college; indeed it was understood that he had entered the Church more in accordance with the wish of his father, the Dean, than his own inclinations. It was very shortly after assuming diaconal orders, and preliminary to his contemplated induction to a remarkably good living in the paternal diocese, that he came to the Hall on a visit, and made his first appearance in southern Northamptonshire.

THE NEW EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM IN ITALY.—A cable despatch from Rome informs us that the Italian Senate has just approved the bill forbidding theological instruction in the public schools. When we remember Italy as Italy was twenty years ago, it is impossible to refuse to admit that this simple announcement reveals a revolution which is one of the most wondrous in modern times. The action of the Italian Senate is important mainly for the reason that it proves that in the ancient stronghold of Catholicism the Church is no longer the ruling power. This will be a fresh source of sorrow to the venerated Pontiff, who is already overburdened with cares.—N. Y. Herald.

"The Rev. George F. Pentecost," says the Independent, "is fast defining his position in Boston. Besides aggravating the Rev. Dr. Fulton, by avowing his belief in the right of free speech in the matter of opening the public library on the Sabbath, he has imitated the coup de Cuyler by introducing Miss Smiley into his pulpit; and now he has invited to his communion-table 'all who love the Lord.' If this is the beginning, what will the end be?"

ALPINE ROSES.

BY RACHEL POMEROY.

On the awful Alpine summits—
Under snows—
Where the climber, weary-footed, Seldom goes;

Where the bloodless Helen rarely Shows its head,— Blossom, so they tell me, flowers
Rusty red;

Blossom roses fragrant-petalled,
Dyed with morn,
On whose tender stemlets never Grows a thorn.

Nature's commoner conditions
Bind them not—
Up among the thunders, somehow, They're forgot.

Now, if it be fact I say not;
For, you see,
I can only tell the story Told to me.

Maybe 'tis a plaintive legend
(I don't know)
Spun from some forgotten meaning,
Long ago.

But they say if you transplant this Vestal fair,
Give it mellow influences,
Blander air,

Make it leave its mountain covert,
Cold and far,
Where it clung in lonely pureness,
Like a star:

In the valley where you set it—
At your feet—
Though it gain a bloom more ample,
Breath more sweet;

Though the kindly breezes fan it Till it feel Through each vein a summer current Shyly steal;

Though the fervid suns compel it
Till it burn
With the passion of the tropics
In its turn,—

Yet shall trouble, unexpected,
Stab it through,
And a compensating anguish
All undo:

For this virgin, valley-nurtured,
Glacier-born,
Now first feels the pricking finger
Of a thorn.

Had you left it in its cloister
There above,
Never thrilled its heart with longing,
Nor with love;

Let no low-complaining zephyr
Come to woo—
'Twould have had a painless being,
Joyless, too.

Had it never known the day god's Flery kiss,
'Twould have lost the pang of living,
And the bliss:

'Twould have staid—a trauced Undine—
Cloud-carossed,
Now—Experience hath woke it—
Which were best?

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Second Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Index Association will be held on Saturday, June 7, at 2½ p. m., in the office of THE INDEX, No 142
 St. Clair street, Toledo.

Rev. Mr. Seaver, of Davenport, Iowa, writes to the Liberal Christian "that Unitarianism has little reason to anticipate substantial and continued assistance from the advocates of free religion." We are somewhat surprised that this had not been discovered before.

Rev. Dr. Fulton (Baptist) thinks it doubtful
 "if New England can be said to have a religion." Is it possible—and Dr. Fulton himself a religious teacher in that locality for many years!
 But perhaps this latter fact throws some light on the former.

Rev. Mr. Hepworth, of New York, preached the other Sunday about "Eating, Drinking, and Dying." Mr. Hepworth knows all about the first two parts of his subject as well as any man, but we dare say he has as yet had no experience of the latter.

The Earlville (Ill.) Transcript says "the heaven and hell of the Church should be in this world; they are now too far off to be effective."
 Would it not be better to have no "heaven" or "hell" at all, but a virtuous love of right and hatred of wrong, without thought of reward or punishment?

A Western Unitarian minister says that "the first task in starting a Unitarian Society in a new field is to convince the community that Unitarianism is respectable." We should suppose that the first thing in order, under such circumstances, would be to convince the community that Unitarianism is true. This being the hardest task should not be left till the last.

Rev. Mr. Hepworth (Orthodox) says that he accepts Christianity because "it has lasted eighteen hundred years, and that is its best proof."
 But Buddhism has lasted much longer, and counts more followers to-day than Christianity.
 If that is your "best proof," Mr. Hepworth, you will excuse us if we still remain unconvinced.

Henry Ward Beecher, in reply to the question,
 "Are there answers to prayers of faith?" says:
 "I regard that as one of the questions of the future." But why should he? Does not Mr.
 Beecher believe his Savior when he says, "Ask, and ye shall receive"? And does he not believe St. James when he says that any man may "ask of God, and it shall be given him"? We are very much afraid Mr. Beecher is not Orthodox as to the Bible and prayer.

Rev. J. D. Fulton, late pastor of the Tremont Temple Baptist Church, in Boston, says that "the true reason why the so-called wealthy and cultured are not converted to Christ is that they will not come to Christ." We might retort and say that the true reason why Mr. Fulton is not a radical is because he will not be a radical. In the first case, however, common sense and reason have something to do with the "will not;"
 but in the last case, have they?

The Boston Investigator says: "Among the five thousand papers, more or less, published in the United States, we only know of one at the present time that can be truly said to be wholly or thoroughly devoted to the improvement, utility, and happiness of mankind in this world.
 That peculiar, eccentric, and, many people think, crazy paper, is the Boston Investigator."

 To say nothing of self-complacency, is not our honored friend of the Investigator a little open to the charge of (this) worldliness?

Rev. C. H. Brigham, of Ann Arbor, Mich., told the Western Unitarian Conference, which met recently at Chicago, that "Unitarianism is dying out in the West." Mr. Brigham is a well informed man, and we believe this has for some time been his opinion about Unitarianism in the West. But this occurrence in the West is only indicative of what must not remotely transpire in the East. When a denomination becomes stagnant in its ideas, revolving on the pivot of "faith in Christ" reduced to its lowest terms, the only merciful fate which is reserved for it is death.

The Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, writing in the December number of the Contemporary Review upon "The Westminster Confession of Faith and Scotch Theology," says of Scotland: "While Conservatism, though in a diminishing degree, reigns in the pulpit, Liberalism reigns in the press; and in the Protestant country most proverbial for its theological unanimity influential and representative journals may almost any day be seen waging a scornful war against the traditional orthodoxy." The same statement might be made even more emphatically of the United States. F. E. A.

A correspondent informs me that in the State of New York the property of clergymen is exempted from taxation to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars. If the same exemption were extended to all, there would be no ground for complaint; but why this favoritism to the clergy? Is a poor doctor or shoemaker or farmer less to be pitied and helped than a poor minister? Justice knows no class legislation. But Christianity has educated the American people to have no sense of justice in matters of this sort.
 It is time for the liberals to be earnest in demanding JUSTICE FOR ALL AND FAVORS FOR NONE. F. E. A.

There is a paper published in Chicago, called The Reconstitution, which says it "advocates the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as the King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint-heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead;
 the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ; a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion, as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins; and a holy life as essential for final salvation." We would respectfully move to amend, by striking out all after the word "advocates," and before the words
 "a holy life," etc. We should then think that paper had some reason for existing.

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, with his characteristic refinement of taste, is opposed to the removal of the Bible from the public schools because he does not wish, as he says, "to stand in the association of those men who, born in the ditch of the political caucus, have been cursed to crawl on their belly through the slush and slime of partisanship, demanding the expulsion in order to please the foreign vote, and anxious to lick the filthy heel of the emigrant before he had time to wash his feet!" But the elegant and evangelical Talmage further remarks that he has "a better argument" yet! He says: "I contend that this is a supreme book from the hands of a Supreme Being, and has a right to go anywhere. If that Bible were written for all lands and ages, who are you to come up and say to the Lord Almighty: 'You may send that Bible any where, but not into our common schools?'" We may be mistaken, but the impression under which we labor is that it was not "the Lord Almighty" who put the Bible into the common schools, but the zealous sectarians and honest bigots; these put it there, and these seem determined to keep it there. The burden of proof is on them to show that "the Lord Almighty" has any interest in the success of their pet purpose.

PAUSE.

What a busy, striving, noisy world is this!
 The hard surface of the earth, stamped and trodden on by the restless feet of thronging men, emits a daily din like to but proportionally greater than that of pans beaten by tumult-loving urhins; and the sound goes up to fret the calm, deep spaces overhead. If it would all go up, we would not mind; but much of it stays here and splits our ears. We sometimes not only tire of working ourselves, but of seeing others work so incessantly. Shirking, indolent idleness is a crime against the material interests of mankind; but chronic, everlasting, surface busyness, that excludes wise leisure and time for thought and meditation, is no less a crime against the higher interests of the human mind and soul.

America is emphatically a nation of workers, and on many accounts it is well she is; but we Americans need more to cultivate the really fine art of intelligent resting and recreation. Every man and woman ought to be so situated that they can afford to rest from toil, not only when the body and the brain are weary, but also when the heart and the spirit claim their rights. This will be the case, when capital and labor are rightly adjusted and come to be mutual friends, not foes; and also when personal greed, mercenary ambition, and insane love of ostentation and finery are reduced to lowest terms, and pure tastes, simple habits, and reasonable wants preside in our lives and homes. But at present our nation is a great mart, full of schemers and plotters and traders, who buy and sell and make gain of everything on earth, and of some things above the earth and which ought to be kept unearthly.
 It is a great workshop full of incessant toilers, who are covered all over with the sticky sweat of drudgery, which stops not only the pores of their skin, but the pores of their minds and souls as well. Capital, which should be so wise and so beneficent, is selfish and greedy, and has put a yoke on labor; and our factories and mines, our great railways and city thoroughfares, our plantations and farms are crowded with the millions who toil continually but for a bare subsistence, and all the while grow more and more unconscious of other wants than those of the body. Our hands are busy at the expense of our heads and hearts. We have woven on our looms of industry a grand material civilization;
 but now we ought to make that the ground-work on which we will stamp the features of a higher civilization yet, one which shall include all the noble and graceful qualities of mind and heart and soul. We want no privileged or genteel class of idlers in this country; no false and harmful distinctions between the workers and the people of leisure. But we do need that all our people should be able to have leisure, and abundance of it, at proper times, and that they should be taught how to use it. Our need is that we relieve men and women from the necessity of drudgery; that we restrain them from the mad spirit of speculation; that we induce them to moderate their wants, correct their habits, purify their tastes; that we inspire them with a love of the beautiful, an aspiration for the good, a lofty devotion to the true.

To our mind, one of the very finest sayings of the old Jewish Scripture, or of any Scripture, is this: "Be still, and know that I am God." We must be still; that is, we must have calm, tranquil, peaceful minds and hearts, unperturbed by envious competitions, heated strifes, and raging passions,—we must thus be still, if we would have any deep knowledge, any true wisdom.
 We all shall be the worst kind of materialists, knowing no God above us or within us, if we do not take time to be still; to go in on ourselves, and find out how high and deep and broad our natures are, how close the heavens and hells to our life, how near the infinite to our finite. We must take time to withdraw now and then from whatever distracts, frets, and angers us,—from whatever gives employment most to our lower faculties, and makes least claim upon our higher, —and look at it all at arm's length, as it were,
 and see if we are really doing wisely and well, if we are living our best life, if we are making the truest progress. We do not need to "get religion," as the Church in such a crisis would tell us; but what we only need is to cultivate the religion of our natures,—the natural religion that belongs to us; the religion that brings out the best that is in us and allows us the best that is above us; that orders and preserves the right relation of all our parts and faculties; that makes us wise and not foolish, rational and not reckless, deep and not shallow. Let us be still long enough to let all that is not of us pass by us, and all that belongs to us overtake us; long enough to see that we are worked upon as well as called to work. Let us pause in our haste and worry and irritation, until we shall have time to observe Nature; and see that she, because she works profoundly, works slowly and works quietly.

DO ANIMALS HAVE SOULS?

Mr. A. Ervin, of Lebanon, Oregon, earnestly requests an answer to his inquiry whether the soul is not the mind, and, if so, whether beasts have not souls. "All animal life," he says, "has mind; for according to my belief animals could never move without a mind,—not so much as one muscle. Is the mind the will-power? If so, you cannot move your finger without willing it to move?"

More difficult queries than these could not easily be propounded to one who is at all conversant with modern investigation and thought on the subject. It is easy to start with arbitrary definitions of mind, soul, spirit, and so forth, and then proceed to explain facts in accordance with a theory. It is not so easy to start with mind as it manifests itself to observation and consciousness, and then proceed to a satisfactory definition. Mental phenomena are so complicated and obscure, and obey laws so little understood, that those are the most reticent on the subject who have studied it most faithfully. I have long been inclined, with Mr. Ervin, to admit the essential identity of all mental action, and to see in animals the cruder and ruder manifestations of the same wonderful faculties which constitute the glory of man. If the evolution-philosophy is true (and I do not see how to escape it), the human mind, whatever in its essence it may be, is a fine development of faculties which exist in germ in lower forms of life.

Animals exhibit will-power; if will-power is the proof of mind, it is difficult to deny that they have minds. From this admission some infer that, if men are immortal, animals must be. While I have no objection whatever to hoping immortality for animals as much as for men, I think the logic of this inference somewhat lame. Out of fifty seeds, perhaps only one develops; and it is conceivable that the seeds of mind have no permanence,—fail to develop into enduring individualities,—unless they are endowed with such original vitality as is possible only in beings as highly organized as men. But it would in this case be difficult to draw such a line as to class all men as immortal and all animals as mortal; for some animals actually appear more intellectual than some men. The worst brutes are two-legged brutes.

Whether all life, as such, is indestructible,—whether every seed of mind, as I have expressed it, is destined to grow, increase, and develop ultimately into something powerful and valuable enough to achieve a permanent being,—is a question that must suggest itself to everybody who does not dogmatically deny the possibility of a higher evolution than is visible to the eye. The universe is very large. It may be lawful to consider it as deep as it is extended; that is, to take for granted that our five senses do not let us into the whole secret of even that with which they deal most intimately. A sixth sense would revolutionize all our science and even our commonest conceptions of things. What reason have we to suppose that all existence is such as to come under the cognizance of human eyes, ears, and noses? We touch reality only at a few points, and those only on the surface. No one could have a profounder conviction than I that there is only one method of studying it, and that the strictest scientific method. But also no one could have a profounder conviction than I that science is a baby yet; that its career is only just beginning; that it little comprehends the magnificence of its own future; that problems which it now scouts as ridiculous it may yet, when wiser, bend its every energy to solve; that, even at its grandest height, it will find infinites still unexplored; that, the wiser it grows, the surer it will be that it cannot with only five senses bring all Nature under examination; that the expansion of its horizon and the intensification of its visual power will be accompanied with increasing modesty, and a self-knowledge that will dispel some of the sophomoric conceit that now proves its immaturity; and, in short, that it will find the regions of its own higher investigations stretching away so far beyond its ken that it will less and less deal in confident negations respecting the unknown.

Perhaps I may seem to have strayed hopelessly from the subject I began with. The truth is it reminds me of the road Mr. Emerson once mentioned as tapering off into a cow-path that terminated in a squirrel-track and ran up a tree. The farther I travel it, the less do I seem to arrive. I should be afraid to answer the questions of my Oregon friend very positively. Beasts may have souls; I hope they have with all my heart, if they can ever come to know what to do with them. Some of their supposed superiors have not learned that lesson yet, and find no use for their souls but to crowd them out of sight as fast as possible. Better have no soul at all than despise its guiding voice. While so many of my fellows evince no vitality that is not wholly explicable as mere reflex-action, I feel more interested in discovering whether all men have souls than in discovering whether beasts have them. But I am disposed to take a cheerful view of both cases, and look forward hopefully to the day when the word "soullessness" shall drop out of the dictionaries. F. E. A.

REPORTING SERMONS.

"The Independent comes very near to insinuating that the New York Herald is Rev. O. B. Frothingham's organ. It says that although Mr. Frothingham preaches in a 'rather small hall,' two-thirds of the seats perhaps being occupied, his 'usual large and fashionable congregation' is constantly mentioned in the Herald, even when Drs. Taylor, Hall, Chapin, Tyng, Beecher, &c., are 'passed by in silence.' Last Sunday Dr. Robinson's church was densely crowded in the morning, and Dr. Bellows' in the evening, to hear George MacDonald preach; and the Herald of Monday knows nothing about it. But Mr. Frothingham's leading columns remained undisturbed. We don't understand it. Perhaps the Free Religiousists have raised a secret-service fund of a million of dollars, and the Herald has been subsidized in their interest."

The above paragraph, which is taken from the Christian Register, furnishes a good text for a "few remarks." Of course the last clause of it is facetious; the editor of the Register is incapable of entertaining the thought that either the preacher in question, or any friend, or the Association whereof he is an unworthy member, pays the Herald for printing the very brief and exceedingly incorrect reports of the Sunday sermons. Even the best-intentioned travesties command no price from the persons "taken off." An officer of the Constitutional Convention (we mean the Convention for "medievalizing" the Constitution of the United States) accused the Free Religious Association of importing and employing a German professor—Dr. Büchner probably—at a salary of ten thousand dollars, to disseminate atheism in America. But even that imaginative Christian would hardly charge the F. R. A. with bribing the Herald to lampoon its own president.

Not that the Herald means to lampoon, caricature, or even misrepresent. Its reports are made stupidly, ignorantly, blunderingly, but in sufficiently good faith. They do about as much justice to one man as to another. But, with all our disrespect for preaching, we contend that it does require a certain modicum of intelligence to report sermons; brains enough, for example, to distinguish what a speaker does not say from what he does; what he affirms from what he denies; what he advocates from what he opposes. This achievement commonly proves too arduous for the scribe who represents the

But the Herald does its oblique best. It does, however, as is correctly observed, diligently omit to give accounts of sermons by the leading "Orthodox divines." Bellows is faithfully passed by. Chapin has a notice now and then; but Hall, Prentice, Rogers, Montgomery, the Tyngs, Schenck, Adams, Hastings, and the sixty or seventy other men of might, have their professional existence duly unrecognized. The reason is—if we may be allowed the conjecture—that everybody knows precisely what they will say on any given theme; their views are familiar, and their mode of expressing them is common-place. There is no need of inquiring what any of the above-named gentlemen will say. They say the same things all the time; they do not suggest any new thought; they give no new setting to old thoughts. The suspicion that Dr. Chapin may by accident say something fresh, attracts an occasional reporter to his tabernacle; but the dead certainty that none of the others will, keeps the inquiring spirits away.

The Herald bestows its attentions, such as they are, on the Roman Catholics and the Rationalists, putting in a little padding between, to propitiate the Protestant Christians. The Romanists and the Rationalists represent the two living and opposite powers, and the Herald, as a live organ, is interested in no others. Romanism stands for one theory of religion, contends mightily for it, makes conquests by force of it; it is dignified, able, aggressive, positive,—has a great future in its hope, as well as a great past in its memory. Rationalism stands for the opposite theory of religion; contends for it according to its ability, and in its name casts out devils. The champions of Romanism may be neither wise nor eloquent, but their principle of spiritual authority is a concern of vital interest to all men. The preachers of Rationalism may lack both talent and learning, but their principle of spiritual liberty is a concern of vital importance to all men. And the paper that professes to heed every vital concern, making no account of the cathedral in the one case, or of the "rather small" and partially filled hall in the other, lays the statement of each before the public.

That the Herald has reported no one more faithfully than Mr. George Hepworth, a mere rhetorician, is very true; but it must be remembered that Mr. Hepworth professed to lead off a new departure, and still professes to do that. When it shall be understood, as soon it will be, that he is simply an old-fashioned Protestant, endowed more than the rest with the "gift of tongues," that he has nothing new, and nothing that deserves to be old, to say,—he will be stricken from the number of the noticed.

Mr. Beecher is always reported, for he is the prince of liberals—without knowing it. His words are significant on the side of freedom, however they may tell in favor of technical Orthodoxy of opinion.

As for the special honor of being exhibited or shown up on Monday morning by the Herald, it is perhaps well enough to say that the victims are consoled in their pain simply by the feeling that they are suffering in a good cause.

SAINTLY MURDER.

There is a foundling hospital in Montreal connected with the "Gray Nunnery." The True Witness (Roman Catholic) thus sums up its operations:—

"If out of the six hundred and eighty-three children born and sent to the Foundling Asylum in 1872 only forty-one have been saved to the earthly community, six hundred and forty-two have been gained to the Heavenly Jerusalem. True, the Foundling Hospital has for one of its objects—an object which it does its best to attain—the physical relief of the tender infants committed to its care, and the prolongation of their existence upon earth; but its main objects are spiritual."

Can the most bigoted Churchman convince himself that this fearful mortality of ninety-four per cent. is necessary? Would not the most utterly atheistic science, that should save the lives of even half these little victims, be a noble and beautiful sight, compared with the saintly ignorance that lets them die, and consoles itself with the thought that "its main objects are spiritual"? Yet how much this symbolizes in our whole treatment of poverty and sin!

THE EFFECT OF REVIVAL.

The air for the past winter has been so full of religious feeling, it cannot be inopportune to offer some strictures upon the tone and method of the prevailing religious activity, and to attempt an estimate of its value and influence. This can be done for any useful end only by proceeding from strictly human as contra-distinguished from theological assumptions. For whatever benefit may be supposed to accrue in the next world as the consequence of a religious experience in this, it is an essential impertinence, and an offence to all right thinking or feeling, to introduce such a consideration as a motive or guide for conduct; for all thought of our condition in the next world, considered as distinct and separate from inherent personal moral qualities, is a pernicious infatuation of the mind.

It may be admitted that some reinforcement of moral motives results from a religious experience such as Protestant Christianity labors for; that a more scrupulous observance of the accepted moralities and proprieties of conduct is effected by it; and that there is, when the character is naturally earnest, something of an increase in the spirit of self-sacrifice. But all this is at the expense of what are called the "intellectual virtues." That is to say, the subject of this experience, just in proportion as it is deep and earnest, suffers a positive moral deterioration of the intellect, especially in relation to all that body of doctrine taken in with the religious experience, and which is supposed to be the intellectual basis and support of it. To illustrate.

The character of Job is in my judgment the most remarkable and impressive that has come down to us from antiquity. Indeed, in the simple grandeur of his moral and religious character his equal is not found in any literature, sacred or profane. His adherence to truth, his implicit reliance on his own integrity, without regard to what might befall him,—with no hope of help in this world or the next (if indeed he had any notion of a next world at all),—is an exhibition of moral and religious exaltation of the very highest type. But Job was a "pagan." He certainly was not a Christian—was not even a Jew. Of the "plan of salvation" he had never heard—had not even heard of the Jewish Messiah. He was a simple child of Nature, stripped of every adventitious aid; with only the naked earth under his feet, the starry vault above him, and within him just that and only that which a common Father vouchsafes to every earnest and devout soul. He had no "Revelation"—had nothing but what belongs to every human being.

Now, to the exclusive claims of Christianity to everything that is highest and best in human thought and history, such a character is an offence. It therefore behooves that Job should be Christianized. It must be made to appear that his greatness of soul came from some dim knowledge at least of the scheme of redemption and a life beyond the grave. It so happens that there are expressions from his lips into which, without much seeming violence, such ideas can be forced. Of course that interpretation will not bear criticism, but it is plausible for the purpose. Any ordinarily intelligent reader, by a little attention to the scope of the argument of that sublime poem, should be able to see at once that the words, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," have no more reference to Christ than they have to President Grant. And it would be equally clear to such a reader that those other words, "In my flesh shall I see God," have no more reference to the Resurrection than they have to the nebular hypothesis. Job did not feel the need of any "Redeemer." He knew himself to be a man of integrity, and he relied upon that and that alone, so far as the administration of the Divine government was concerned. In that very thing consisted his moral and religious greatness. True, he suffered poignantly a loss of the confidence, sympathy, and respect of good men, to which he felt himself entitled. Moreover, that profoundest of all problems, how to reconcile the course of events in this world with the Divine justice, perplexed him beyond measure. The theory on that subject which his friends adopted drove them to the conclusion that Job was an exceptionally wicked man. Job's calamities were in their opinion at once a proof of his wickedness and a deserved punishment for it. From such an unjust imputation Job needed to be vindicated; and the word rendered "Redeemer" is misleading and unfortunate. After Job had failed, with all his arguments and eloquence, to show his friends that whatever the true theory of the Divine government might be, theirs at least was an erroneous one and terribly unjust in its inferences as to him, he had no resource but to reassert with utmost vehemence his innocence, and his conviction that the man was living who should completely vindicate him and restore to him his lost reputation. And not only so; but that, reinstated in his former prosperity, he should regain his health and stand up his own vindicator in the fact that all that prosperity which they would accept as the only evidence of Divine favor should be restored to him. And it so turned out. Yet I have on my centre-table a large illustrated family Bible, containing running comments on the text, or rather reflections designed apparently as aids and incitements to Evangelical piety. On the text under consideration, the comments run something after this fashion: "The faith which Job had in a living Redeemer, in what Christ had done for him, and his hope of a resurrection, enabled him to rise above temporal ills. Those blessed words of triumphant faith, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and so forth.

Now to this illustrative example of Job it may be replied: "Well, an erroneous interpretation of a Bible text, if honestly made, and especially if not detrimental to morality and religion, is no great matter." True, it is not; and if that were all it would hardly justify the reference. The quality of piety nursed upon such aliment might be open to suspicion, whether we consider the interpretation as the result of mere intellectual imbecility without any conscious falsifying of the text, or as a deliberate fraud. Upon the latter supposition, even though made in the supposed interest of true piety, it would call forth the honest indignation of all good men. But it is hardly supposable, in the present instance, that a man of reputable standing would wilfully falsify the record and make the sacred page itself the vehicle of his fraud. Nor would that illustrate the point sought to be made in this paper, which is as to a mischief more subtle than a conscious fraud, and vastly more destructive to true progress.

Consider for a moment the intellectual thralldom which gives birth to such an error. What competency, however learned he may be, does such a man carry to the investigation of any question nearly related to his religious convictions and theories? He has not that disqualification merely of which a high-minded judge is conscious, when he declines to pass upon any question involving his near relatives or his own pecuniary interest. The mood of his mind is vastly lower and more disqualifying for every purpose of truth. He starts off, makes it a matter of supreme moral obligation to start off, in every investigation, with the firm conviction that Christ is the supreme fact in the universe—the fact to which in every department of thought "every knee must bow." His intellect is committed, by the whole force of his moral and religious nature, to the entire Evangelical theory, which theory he believes is the sole basis and justification not only of his own religious experience but of every other that is worthy of the name. He has, to begin with, accepted the whole Christian scheme, and has accepted it under the full conviction that he would be eternally lost if he did not; that God is already at enmity with him for not having accepted it before. Now what qualifications for a fair investigation does such an intellectual mood afford? The first step is an abjuration of the only true method of inquiry. An implicit reliance upon the result of a cool and normal intellectual process of reasoning is believed to be proof of a rebellious heart. Once let any rational creature become so demoralized as to lose confidence in the essential rectitude of his intellectual faculties, and he is ready for the acceptance of any vagary he finds afloat in the air about him, or any absurdity which an excited imagination may suggest. Christ is the truth; of course he is. He says, "I am the Truth." That being settled beyond any dispute or question, we have a basis on which to build, an infallible test of all truth. Be sure then to hold fast to Christ, and you have the surest guarantee against error of thought as well as of practice.

The character of this tenure, so far as it is merely religious, consists in preserving a profoundly devotional frame of mind; but so far as intellectual processes are concerned, it consists in resisting every doubt, in never so much as for a moment entertaining the thought of a remote possibility of any fundamental error in the Evangelical scheme, and in taking it for granted that all the sceptical suggestions of modern historical and scientific criticism are instigated by a heart at enmity with God. This is substantially the intellectual condition of one greatly under the revival influence, and in which he approaches any subject nearly related to his religious theories. His intellect has lost a certain balance, a certain judicial tone and attitude, which renders it unfit for the performance of its rightful functions; namely, to be the supreme unbiased arbiter for every rational creature of what is true in thought and right in life.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, March 30, 1873.

I say what I believe to-day, if it contradicts all I said yesterday.—Emerson.

THE ORIGIN OF LIFE.

In the first place, at the very outset, we find one singular, universal fact. All animals, without exception, high or low, of whatever ultimate complexity or simplicity of structure, originate from eggs, and from eggs of the same character. I do not mean to be understood that there is no other mode of multiplying. Some animals, as corals for instance, many hydroids, and other low organisms, reproduce themselves by budding or by division of the parent stock. But they also, at some time or other, produce eggs, and thus bear their testimony to the general law of Nature which applies to the whole animal kingdom without exception. Indeed, the seed in plants has the same structure as the so-called ovarian eggs in animals, and thus we may speak of all organized beings, vegetable or animal, as multiplying by eggs. The discovery that this great law applies to the higher animals also, is comparatively recent. It is only fifty years since Carl Ernst Von Baer made his wonderful researches on the egg of the dog and rabbit, and announced that the mammal has an ovarian egg identical with that of all other vertebrates, and with that of articulates, mollusks, and radiates. The discovery of this universal law that all organized beings multiply by the same means, is certainly one of the greatest and most startling generalizations of modern times. It gives us the broadest ground for our inquiry into their ultimate relations, since they have all one starting point. At first it may seem to simplify the inquiry; but the moment we leave the point at which all animals seem alike, and enter upon the various phases of transformations to be gone through before they reach the adult condition, a field of study opens before us sufficient to fill many lifetimes. We come upon a series of phenomena of the deepest interest, but often in their first aspect very perplexing. There are transient phases in the growth of the higher animals, during which they resemble the permanent final conditions of adult animals lower down in the same type; having, that is, a like structure, but of inferior development. These comparisons cannot, however, be carried on outside the limits of one and the same type. You may compare a quadruped in certain phases of its growth with the adult condition of some lower kinds of vertebrates, and be amazed at the resemblance; but you cannot carry the comparison over into the type of articulates, or into any other type of the animal kingdom based upon a different plan. Within each type, the development has a character as distinct as the plan on which the type is built. An insect, for instance, can never at any time of its development, after it has passed out of that universal condition of the ovarian egg to which I alluded, be compared to an oyster or a fish, but it passes through phases where it can hardly be distinguished from a worm; that is, in the course of its development it bears a transient likeness to the adult condition of a being standing lower in the type of articulates to which they both belong. In short, every animal belonging to any one of the higher groups, during the transformations by which he reaches the adult state, may pass through modified conditions, in each of which he resembles some being of his own type of the animal kingdom for whom that condition is final. Enough is known of the transformations of animals now, to make this generalization a perfectly trustworthy one; although the number of illustrations is small. The study of embryology is exceedingly difficult, and the sacrifice of specimens is very great in order to obtain the complete history of the growth of any one animal. The progress of these investigations must necessarily be slow, because they are so laborious and so costly; but they have already assumed sequence and coherence enough to afford a sound basis for the result I have just given. While the phases of growth and resemblance have been followed, the limitations keeping each primary type within its own boundaries have not been sufficiently considered, and are, indeed, generally wholly lost sight of. This carelessness of investigation, or of statement, gives currency to broad generalizations, partially true, indeed, but false when they are made to cover too wide a ground.—Professor Agassiz, Harvard Lecture.

At a religious gathering in Chicago a few years since, one of the speakers was the venerable Dr. Goodell. Broken in mind and body, but animated by the occasion, the aged clergyman said: "Friends, I am far upon my journey to the celestial city; but I could not help stopping on my way to attend this meeting in Chicago." Here a voice from the multitude was heard by all: "Chicago is not on that road." The effect was electrical, especially upon the poor old gentleman, who was so confused that he could say no more, and was obliged to sit down.—St. Louis Globe.

Uncle—"Now, Sammy, tell me, have you ever read the beautiful story of Joseph?" Sam—"Oh, yes." Uncle—"Well, then, what wrong did they do when they sold their brother?" Sam—"They sold him entirely too cheap, I think."

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also THE Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on THE Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, THE Golden Age, a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and tollowing attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows blinding the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though THE Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has undertaken upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something of a shock about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope before you forget it, and address

THE LITERARY WORLD,

A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1873. It has been the aim of its conductor to make it an acceptable vehicle of honest and trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers.

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorials, brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER says: "I have been a constant reader of thy paper, THE LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deferring to its judgment in the purchase of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiment in this direction seems to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared."

The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

Three Important Books

FOR THINKING READERS.

Oriental Religions,

And their relation to Universal Religion.
India. By SAMUEL JOHNSON. 8vo. 802 pages. $5.00.

"The reader who is curious in the history of opinions, will hardly find a more instructive guide in the obscure labyrinth into which he is tempted by the study of Oriental reasonings and fancies. Mr. Johnson has thoroughly mastered the subject of which he treats, by the thoughtful researches of many years."—New York Tribune.

Enigmas of Life.

By W. H. ORG. 1 vol. 12mo. $2.00.

Contents.—Realizable Ideals; Malthus Notwithstanding; Non-Survival of the Fittest; Limits and Directions of Human Development; The Significance of Life; De Profundis; Elsewhere; Appendix.

"The whole set of essays is at once the profoundest and the kindest that has for some time tried to set people a-thinking about themselves and their destiny."—Daily Telegraph (London).

Literature and Dogma.

By MATTHEW ARNOLD. 1 vol. 12mo. 150.

In the preface of this remarkable book, Mr. Arnold says: "An inevitable revolution of which we all recognize the beginnings and signs, but which has already spread, perhaps, farther than most of us think, is being felt in the religion in which we have been brought up. The book itself is a notable sign of this revolution. It is written with a very earnest purpose, with great vigor and suggestiveness of thought, and with that perfect clearness of style which distinguishes all of Mr. Arnold's writings. Its publication is an event in the history of religious literature."

NOTES AND AN INTRODUCTION

BY PROF. T. F. MOSES,

OF YERKES ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY.

1 volume, crown 8vo. $1.50.

"In this charming treatise, M. Emile Saigy gives a very lucid account of the latest mode of speculating on the Physical Facts of the Universe. It is a mode which may be described as bringing all the resources of modern science to the proof of the fact that the human mind is incapable of any intelligible conception of physical facts which does not resolve itself into matter and motion. There is in fact but one science under many names, and that science is mechanics. Atoms, and the laws which regulate their movements,—this is all our material universe."

PROSPECTUS FOR 1873.—SIXTH YEAR.

THE ALDINE.

AN ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY JOURNAL, UNIVERSALLY ADMITTED TO BE THE HANDICRAFT PERIODICAL IN THE WORLD. A REPRESENTATIVE AND CHAMPION OF AMERICAN TASTE.

Not for Sale in Book or News Stores.

THE ALDINE, while issued with all the regularity, has none of the temporary or timely interest characteristic of ordinary periodicals. It is an elegant miscellany of pure, light, and graceful literature; and a collection of the rarest specimens of artistic skill, in black and white. Although each succeeding number affords a fresh pleasure to its friends, the real value and beauty of THE ALDINE will be most appreciated after it has been bound up at the close of the year. While other publications may claim superior cheapness, as compared with the value of a similar class, THE ALDINE is a unique and original conception—alone and unapproached—absolutely without competition in price or character. The possessor of a complete volume cannot dispute the quantity of fine paper and engravings in any other shape of literary volumes, for ten times its cost; and then there are the chromos besides!

ART DEPARTMENT.—Notwithstanding the increase in the price of engraving last fall, when THE ALDINE assumed its present noble proportions and representative character, the edition was more than doubled during the past year; proving that the American public appreciate and will support a sincere effort in the cause of Art. The publishers, anxious to justify the ready confidence thus demonstrated, have exerted themselves to the utmost to develop and improve the work; and the plans for the coming year, as unfolded by the monthly lists, will astonish and delight even the most sanguine friends of THE ALDINE.

The publishers are authorized to announce designs from many of the most eminent artists of America.

In addition, THE ALDINE will reproduce examples of the best foreign masters, selected with a view to the highest artistic and the greatest general interest; avoiding such as have become familiar, through photographs, or copies of any kind.

The quarterly tinted plates, for 1873, will reproduce four of John S. Davis' immortal child sketches, appropriate to the four seasons. These plates, appearing in the last four numbers, April, July, and October, would be alone worth the price of a year's subscription.

The popular feature of a copiously illustrated "Christmas" number will be continued.

To possess such a valuable epitome of the art world, at a cost so trifling, is an advantage of thousands in every section of the country; but, as the usefulness and attractions of THE ALDINE can be enhanced, in proportion to the numerical increase of its supporters, the publishers propose to make "assurance doubly sure" by the following unparalleled offer of PRIZES TO SUBSCRIBERS FOR 1873. Every subscriber to THE ALDINE who pays in advance for the year 1873, will receive, without additional charge, a pair of beautiful oil chromos, after J. J. Hill, the eminent English painter. The pictures entitled "The Village Belle," and "Crossing the Moor," are 14x20 inches—are printed from 25 different plates requiring 25 impressions and time to perfect each picture. The same chromos are sold for $30 per pair, in the art stores. As it is the determination of its conductors to keep THE ALDINE out of the reach of competition in every department, the chromos will be found correspondingly ahead of any that can be offered by other periodicals. Every subscriber will receive a certificate, over the signature of the publishers, guaranteeing that the chromos delivered shall be equal to the examples furnished the agent, or the money will be refunded. The distribution of pictures of this grade, free to the subscribers to a five dollar periodical, will mark an epoch in the history of art; and, considering the unprecedented cheapness of the price for THE ALDINE itself, the marvel falls little short of a miracle, even to those best acquainted with the achievements of inventive genius and improved mechanical appliances. (For illustrations of these chromos, see November issue of THE ALDINE.)

The LITERARY DEPARTMENT will continue under the care of Mr. RICHARD HENRY STODDARD, assisted by the best writers and poets of the day, who will strive to have the literature of THE ALDINE always in keeping with its artistic attractions.

TERMS.—$5 per annum. In advance, with Oil Chromos free. THE ALDINE will hereafter be obtainable only by subscription. There will be no reduced or club rate; cash for subscriptions must be sent to the publishers direct, or handed to the local agent, without responsibility to the publishers, except in cases where the certificate is given, bearing the facsimile signature of JAMES BUTTON & CO.

AGENTS WANTED.—Any person wishing to act permanently as a local agent, will receive full and prompt information by applying to

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER MILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

The Little Bouquet.

The above-named beautiful Monthly Magazine, designed for the youth and children, will be issued on the 15th of May, and will more than meet the expectations of the most sanguine Spiritualists and Liberals. It will be a work of rare beauty, and acceptable as a literary production every way suited to the times. Its embellishments will be appropriate and artistic. It will be furnished at ACTUAL COST, estimated upon a subscription list of twenty thousand for the first year.

Those who order and send FIFTY CENTS for specimen copies, will have that amount deducted from the regular yearly subscription, and secure it at the balance of the year for $1.35. The Magazine at regular rates—such as are charged on all similar monthlies, to ensure a living profit to the publisher—should not be less than $2.50 per annum. But it has been the intention of the proprietor, for at least eight years, to publish a magazine for the youth and children, that should not only command their respect but their admiration and love. To the end that it might become COSMOPOLITAN, the subscription price has been placed at figures that will guarantee it to the family circle of the most humble citizens in America and England.

Let us have orders for twenty thousand copies of this admirable work—the FIRST of its kind EVER PUBLISHED—to all with the first number. It matters little to us whether the orders be for specimen copies on the terms before stated, or for a year's subscription at $1.50—knowing full well that no one who secures a specimen copy will hesitate to send for at least eight years, to publish a magazine for the youth and children, that should not only command their respect but their admiration and love. To the end that it might become COSMOPOLITAN, the subscription price has been placed at figures that will guarantee it to the family circle of the most humble citizens in America and England.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The True Theory of Rewards and Punishments.

A SERMON PREACHED IN ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, FEBRUARY 11, 1872.

BY THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY.

"There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."—ISAIAH, LVI. 21.

Our reflections on moral evil naturally lead us to the question of rewards and punishments,—a question not only most deeply interesting in itself, but one to the proper or improper understanding of which are attached certain legal rights or disqualifications under the present law of the land. Whether or not the law of the land requires a magistrate or a judge, before receiving an oath, to put the question, "Do you believe in rewards and punishments hereafter?" some such question is generally put to a witness in every case where the rights of his citizenship have been challenged; and this alone gives an interest to the careful definition of our thoughts on the subject which might otherwise be wanting. It would be strange indeed if the progress and elevation of our thoughts concerning God and his dealings should land us in a state of conflict with some old statutes. It might be very unpleasant, but we know which would have to give way in the end.

One of the most striking, but perhaps least noticed, of all the beauties of the new theology is the place which it assigns to Rewards and Punishments. It is almost our highest aim to get people to do right simply because it is right, and to avoid what is wrong solely because it is wrong. We value at the lowest farthing that old motto: "Honesty is the best policy;" because, even if it be true, it contains a thought with which we have no right to be familiar. We desire to put honesty supremely above policy, and to inculcate a virtue which is infinitely nobler than worldly wisdom. To obey a higher law instead of a lower one only that we may gain more by it in the end, is to debase the action by the motive, to corrupt the character in polishing the manners, and to cultivate selfishness so as to make heroism impossible. Now all this we emphatically desire to abolish.

The old Orthodoxy which taught the danger of sinning, and the advantage of being religious, inculcated bad motives for right conduct. I wish we could speak of it as a thing of the past; but this very season of Lent which is drawing near will furnish hundreds and thousands of appeals based upon men's fears of hell or their greed of heaven. Men, women, and children will be summoned to repent and believe, by High Church and Low Church alike, solely on the ground of the fear of punishment and the hope of reward. The repudiation of this is new in the Christian world, though it was well known to the Stoics, and to the Roman philosophers who learned in that school. If we want, in fact, to get elevated thoughts, feelings, and motives on the subject of morals, we must look for them in the writings of so-called pagans, and never in those of the Christians. The loftiness of the moral principles of the Stoics puts Christendom to shame. They had not even the prospect of a future life in which to enjoy the consequences of their virtue on earth; the Christians on the other hand make everything to turn on the hopes of a heaven hereafter, without which, as an apostle says, they would "be of all men the most miserable." The pagans understood and valued the mere practice of virtue for its own sake; the Christians, on the other hand, are always urging us to keep "an eye on the recompense of the reward," and hold up for our imitation the example of their master who, they tell us, "endured the cross, despising the shame, for the sake of the joy that was set before him." It must be confessed that Christianity, in this respect, is many degrees below the pagan philosophy which it so impudently despised. And now we are coming back to that fine old theory of disinterested virtue, and raise our voice against that corrupting and debasing system of Rewards and Punishments on which Christianity itself is based, and without which it could not stand a day. Almost the only thing in Semitic theology which we heartily repudiate, is that mercenary element which runs through portions of the Hebrew Scriptures; and which, when applied to individual conduct, is preeminently mischievous and degrading. It was to the theology of the Hebrews, after its corruption by contact with Persia, that Christianity owed its hell of retribution and its heaven of reward.

The time has now come when the system of Rewards and Punishments has to be looked at with the closest scrutiny. We must first inquire as to the matter of fact. Is all wrong-doing punished? Is all rightness rewarded? If so, how is the wrong punished and the right rewarded?

As to the matter of fact, a great deal of what is called wrong-doing goes unpunished, and a great deal of what is called rightness goes unrewarded. We need not stop to prove this, because our Orthodox friends make it the basis of their heaven and hell. "If there were no such instances of failure of justice," say they; "if the world were not full of instances in which the wicked seem to go unpunished and the righteous unrewarded,—we should be deprived of one of our strongest evidences in proof of a future state in which these irregularities could be adjusted." But it does not follow that, because people think they see injustice or failure of justice, therefore it is so. My explanation of the facts is that a great deal of what we call wrong-doing is not culpable evil, and a great deal of what is called rightness is not commendable virtue; and therefore there is no failure of justice if certain acts which we call wrong go unpunished, and certain acts which we call right go unrewarded. Moreover, we ask, Is it possible that we should be able to tell with certainty when our fellow-men deserve punishment or reward? The conditions on which either can be infallibly determined are unknown to us. We see, it is true, all the outside; and we may be quite right in our moral verdict upon what we see. We may be very right in our guesses at the motives, judging from ourselves and from past experience; but the outside cannot tell us anything of the moral effort put forth within, or of the powerful remonstrances quelled, or of the hidden springs which laid the temptation or added tenfold to its power. Our guesses, too, at motive are but guesses; and just as "the heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger cannot intermeddle with its joy," so the soul of the sinner alone knows its own innocence and its own guilt. No human verdict can detract from the one or lighten the other. A man is only guilty as he knows himself to be; and the righteous Ruler of the world metes out the punishment in proportion to the guilt, and rewards in like manner, with impartial and unflinching promptitude, the real efforts of virtue.

But when we speak of Rewards and Punishments, we do not in the least degree mean by these terms what is generally understood by them. Generally the term reward means some kind of prosperity which is given in return for good conduct; just as we give a prize to a boy at school for certain attainments. The reward which the Orthodox expect is a home beyond the grave, of never-ending pleasure, in return, not for their own good conduct, but for their right belief in another's good conduct,—for their Orthodoxy, in fact, which they consider of much more importance than all other kinds of virtue. So the punishment which in their opinion awaits the wicked,—the unorthodox most of all, because heresy is the worst of sins,—is a condition of personal misery as perfectly distinct from the sins of the man as imprisonment or hanging is distinct from crime. Of course it is easy enough to account for the invention of this theory of Rewards and Punishments. There certainly is a time of life through which we all pass, and in which it is impossible to train children without a little of this system of Rewards and Punishments. I say a "little," because generally it is monstrously extended beyond its proper limits, and beyond the age in which it acts beneficially. But a little wholesome mixture of good things and physical pain promptly, judiciously administered, as reward and punishment, is absolutely needful at an early stage of children's discipline,—say from one to five years of age. But precisely because it is fit for such little children, it is not fit for boys and girls of riper years; still less for the control of men and women. Reward and Punishment, as we understand these terms in the Divine discipline, are far different from this babyish conception of them which has become the basis of Christianity. God's reward is the approval of ourselves by the conscience, commending our motives, or moral effort, or both; and also the pleasure which we may derive from seeing the good that we have done to others. God's punishment is the condemnation of ourselves by the conscience, when our moral effort has been less than we might have put forth, or when our motives were not pure; and also the pain we feel when we see the injury done by our bad conduct, or failure in duty. Reward is the approval of conscience. Punishment is remorse. I know of no other definitions of Reward and Punishment, that will not break down under the stress of being applied to facts.

And it is because this is my view of what Reward and Punishment are respectively, that I demur to the popular notion that any real evil is going unpunished, any real good going unrewarded. I refuse to recognize in the outward lot of men any indication of their deservings or undeservings. Believing that no one can do real good without knowing it, and rejoicing in the knowledge of it then and there,—and that no one can be guilty of any wrong without the sense of guilt more or less strong at the time, or at all events very soon after some physical paroxysm has passed away,—I cannot bring myself to believe that there is any delay of justice, much less any miscarriage of it. A man suffers remorse according to his guilt,—and God is the only judge of that; a man enjoys himself according to his real goodness. Please to notice the expression, "enjoys himself." I do not mean that he enjoys the outer world, or is in good spirits, or is, as it is said, happy; but I mean that a man has always and will have always the satisfaction which belongs to right conduct whenever he has done right, and the greater his efforts have been to conquer himself and to resist temptation, the greater will be his inward satisfaction. But just as that punishment is not vindictive, but only corrective, so that reward is not a bribe, but only an index for future guidance. The sons of God have no business to be turning about for wages, to be serving him for hire. It is reward enough to be growing like him, and to have a voice in the heart which tells us when we are and when we are not doing his will and walking in his steps. It is a wonder that men and women have not learned by watching their children, that so-called punishment never succeeds in correcting faults till it awakens a sense of shame and remorse. All that outward punishment can do is to alter the conduct and debase the motives, to bring about conformity of behavior to certain rules from a selfish or cowardly dread of physical inconvenience; and it may be kept up for years, only making the child worse at heart, until all at once the punishment has been accompanied by some judicious appeal to its nobler feelings, and then it passes before the judgment seat of God in the first pangs of self-reproach. That does it good; it makes the whole being purer and nobler. The inward voice will not be content with mere good conduct, but insists on right motives and right principles; and is inflexible, unsparring, and inexorably true and just. When men flatter you with false praise, the inward voice is merciless in its execration. When men blame you undeservedly, the same inward voice covers your soul with an adamant shield, through which the hottest shafts of detraction can never penetrate. Splendid justice this which gives the lie to all that fable about the depravity and deceitfulness of the human heart; which restores God to his rightful sovereignty as law-giver and judge, and sweeps away from the pathway of man the trinkets and baubles which would entice him on the one hand, and the ghosts and hobgoblins which would terrify him on the other!

God's rewards and punishments thus leave the will free and the heart pure. The punishments are only to correct; the rewards to direct. It would be well to abolish the old terms along with the old sense; but there shall be no mistake about the latter. You will hardly believe it, but I know some persons who were in doubt about joining us, until they were satisfied as to what our teaching was concerning the punishment of the wicked after death. It seemed to them such a shocking thing to leave the wicked, as they called them, in their Maker's hands; to have no fixed theories as to what he ought to do with them. I am delighted to disappoint the wishes of such folk, and to say openly: "What right have you to call them wicked, and to leave yourself out of the list? Why should you be considered as less deserving of future punishment than they? If there are such people who are so much more wicked than you as to need special punishments to make them good, 'shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' I have no theories of that future state. I have alone as my anchor of hope, sure and steadfast, a belief in a God who is good, and who can never be anything but good to every soul whom he has made; and it is so tremendous a bliss to believe it, that on the strength of it I would take my chance with the worst of those whom you call the wicked, and would infinitely prefer to be left to the 'uncovenanted mercies' of God." Of course we believe that everything has its fruit, that consequences follow causes with unerring certitude; but whatever may be the details of our future life, one great sequence must ever follow the first great Cause—good and happy creatures from a good and happy Creator. The process may be slow, but logically sure and certain. Hence we dispense entirely with the ordinary notion of rewards and punishments, leaving God to provide his own safeguards of morality when our silly little contrivances to prop it up have been blown away by the first breath of inquiry. We are contented to accept in place of them the verdicts of our own hearts; and therefore we must abandon not only the Orthodox ideas respecting them, but those materialistic ideas also which limit the area of rewards and punishments to the varying conditions of happiness and misery that are experienced on earth.

I will only reiterate the burden of this discourse, that rewards and punishments, as generally understood, do not and cannot make men good; that the only real lever of the character is to be found in the verdict of each man's own conscience. It is almost a truism to say: "There is no peace to the wicked," and "Great peace have they who love thy law." The possession or the want of this peace does not tell a man where he stands in the ranks of virtue, whether very high or very low. If he has the answer of a good conscience, it refers to the definite case put before it. If he is inwardly disturbed by self-reproach, it is about something immediate and palpable. It is not always the highest natures that are most often commended by conscience, not the lowest natures who are most often condemned. These differences arise from a variety of causes, a comprehensive view of which is possible only to God. But we may be very sure that if we have not inward peace, we are either doing wrong or not doing as much right as we could, or else our motives are impure or our aims unworthy. There can be no peace to the wicked, no approving voice of conscience for that which God condemns. Not that we would be so foolish as to tie down his decrees to our finite and fallible convictions; but he has so ordered the nature and constitution of man that man only blames himself according to his real blameableness, which is measured not merely by a sense of obligation, but also by the conviction of being able to do what we believe we ought to have done.

It is very doubtful, therefore, whether the oath of a man holding these views which I have put forth this morning would be legally admissible. If a magistrate were to ask me: "Do you believe in rewards and punishments?" I could only answer honestly by saying: "Certainly not, as you are in the habit of interpreting those words. I only believe in the Divine appointment of self-approval and remorse." The rewards and punishments of actual life, which we see around us, are of purely human invention, mainly but rudely just; at best but clumsy expedients for the protection of society and the culture of manners, leaving men radically unchanged for the better and their characters untouched, except perhaps a little more debased in motive than they were before. Most surely do I believe in the rewards which society is able to bestow on the slaves of fashion and convention, and on those who have the rare merit of success. No less surely do I believe in the punishments which fall on the heads of those who are independent, who will think for themselves and try to lead instead of follow custom: most of all in those punishments which visit the defeated and the unsuccessful.

But although the acceptance of these facts is thus forced upon us by eyesight and experience, I believe a thousand-fold more vividly in this other fact—that God often approves what society condemns, and condemns what society approves; that vox populi is only once in ten times vox Dei, and then only by chance. And after weighing one against the other, I find that God's verdict is the stronger in the end; that his reward is more enticing, and his punishments more deterring than all the bribes and threats which this world can bring to bear on human conduct,—inasmuch as we find that the judgments of one man's heart, either for praise or blame, have changed the hearts of a whole nation, have reversed the decrees of kings, of republics, democracies, churches, and general councils, and brought the wildest men and women out of anarchy into their right minds. And as it is only by means of these secret tribunals in men's own hearts that they are ever made better or nobler, so only by this means is mankind raised from stage to stage, and the rarest and purest principles of human conduct spread from a few individuals over the surrounding multitudes. We cannot therefore offer to God a more wise petition than that of the old Psalmist: "Search me, O God, and try the ground of my heart; prove me and examine my thoughts. Look well if there be any way of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting."

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

Arriving a couple of months anterior to our first chapter, this fascinating gentleman had, at various croquet parties, archery meetings, picnics, and similar rural festivities, of which he was the acknowledged hero and lion, paid Ruth a great many attentions; sufficient, in fact, to set everybody talking and the girl's heart fluttering with hitherto unknown sensations. At first, however, she was rather shy of him, thinking his addresses too sudden—that they betrayed a certain objectionable impulsiveness which suggested that he was attracted merely by her beauty, a species of homage which she could not regard as complimentary. A pretty girl, conscious of brains, is apt to resent being approached as that and nothing else; nor is the case at all improved when she happens to be good as well as sensible, and suspects a lack of reverence for her sex which offends her moral purity. I do not say that this was precisely the fact with Ruth, but the apprehension that it might be so impelled her to make Mr. Bligh keep his distance. Then, too, she detested flirtation, and was revolted by the eager attempts at captivating him on the part of some of her young lady acquaintances, and thus provoked into additional antagonism; and every way it behooved a country girl of seventeen, ward only to an old vicar, whose income might be counted on three fingers, to be very circumspect in her demeanor towards the only son of a wealthy ecclesiastic who was almost next in rank to a bishop, and came into the world, so to speak, badged and ticketed for a first-class position. Accordingly Miss Gower chose to be exceedingly cool and distant towards her handsome admirer during his earlier advances, which was the very behavior most calculated to insure the persistence of a man at once amorous and obstinate, and intelligent enough to appreciate the value of the prize which he might perhaps have thought less of had it proved more easily attainable. The girl's pride and self-respect piqued his vanity, while her beauty fired his imagination and presently gave birth to a passion sincere enough to induce very serious consequences. Hence he persevered, and, in spite of graver reasons for self-restraint than he cared to take into serious consideration, talked his best, looked his pleasantest, and in various ways continued to insinuate the greatest possible compliment a man can pay to a woman. It was not in the nature of things that Ruth should long regard such a suitor either with distrust or indifference.

For all her haughtiness and wilfulness, she really entertained but a modest idea of her own merits. She was imperious from excess of vitality and the deference paid to her by others, rather than pride or vanity, and had her full share of the sentimentality natural to a girl bred up in the country. Again, she was by no means deficient in her sex's orthodox admiration of clergymen, or of social position. She had lived in a very contracted though kindly circle, which fully appreciated her admirer's prospects, and her friends' opinions inevitably influenced her own. The ladies of the Hall, two excellent old maids, with whom she was a great favorite, thought it would be a capital match for her, and easily persuaded themselves that Mr. Bligh's father, dean though he was, must be too fond and proud of his son to refuse his consent. Such a dignitary, they believed, was above suspicion of worldly motives; and where could he find a nicer daughter-in-law than Ruth? If her guardian did not share these very unsophisticated ideas, he said nothing to discourage them, beyond assuming that she was altogether too young to think of matrimony. Like the spinsters, he was too discreet to commit himself by open encouragement; but their evident interest and sympathy, and, in fact, tacit connivance, could not but have its effect. Add to which incentives the homage of a handsome, agreeable man, socially the superior to anybody she had ever encountered (and perhaps the little feminine one of triumphing over her companions by carrying off the prize for which they were all contending), and it will be seen that everything conspired to induce Ruth to return a favorable answer to a question which was presently asked her—with unexpected contingencies.

Before then, however, he exhibited certain singularities of behavior, which at first puzzled and then provoked her. These consisted of occasional alternations from an almost passionate attraction towards her, which admitted but of one interpretation, to constraint and comparative relapses into mere gallantry. He appeared afraid to trust himself; unquiet, uneasy. Her assumption of indifference towards him—it was only an assumption now—stimulated him to ardent pursuit, but encouragement repelled and embarrassed him. Sometimes he seemed desirous of avoiding her; once she did not see him for a week. Suspecting he was vacillating, Ruth was all but fierce to him on their next meeting—and she looked especially handsome when in a passion. That afternoon he volunteered both a declaration and explanation. He told her, with some inflation of manner, but perhaps no more confusion than most men exhibit on such interesting occasions, that he loved her, deeply, dearly, and devotedly; and had looked forward to making the avowal with equal pride and pleasure, until recently, when something had happened which forbade indulgence in the latter, though it could not change or impair his sentiments. As she knew, his prospects in life had warranted his aspirations; now, however, it seemed as if he must plead his passion alone, irrespective of such considerations. He would not disguise from her the fact that his knowledge of his father's character had given him reason for apprehending some difficulty in securing his approbation, especially as his choice conflicted with an avowed wish of the old gentleman's that he should marry a cousin (who was, also, an heiress); still he had flattered himself that his paternal affection, no less than his sense of justice, would reconcile him to his own self-imposed disappointment, particularly as he (Mr. George Bligh) had always objected to the match in question—first, because it suggested dictation in a matter which ought to be purely voluntary; secondly, because the lady was his cousin; and lastly in consequence of her want of sense, which quite impaired the effect of her undenia-ble claims to beauty—and here he paid a neat compliment to Ruth. In this expectation he had been about to inform his father of the state of his affections, when it appeared that some malicious busybody had anticipated him, in terms he would not insult her by disclosing; but the result was that the arbitrary old dean had written him a letter, insisting on the immediate transfer of his addresses to the lady already mentioned, on penalty of the severest paternal displeasure—indeed, renunciation, if he persisted in his own inclinations. There were also other reasons alleged for this act of severity, reflecting not merely on himself, and, therefore, best dismissed with the contempt they merited. He had remonstrated against such monstrous injustice with all the fervor inspired by the occasion, but in vain—his father adhered to his determination. It was this unpleasant secret which had troubled him of late, perplexing him with the alternative either of offering her the hand of one who was conditionally disinherited, or of withdrawing, at the risk of the cruellest misconstruction. That, from her, he could not bear; and hence the present confession. He should assuredly allow no earthly consideration to come between himself and so great a happiness, if he were fortunate enough to win her favor. He was not, he hoped, without talents, and able to work his own way in the world, if his father continued obdurate; in any case, he loved her, entirely and unchangeably—could she find him no word of encouragement?

Ruth had never been so much pleased or so distressed in her life. She answered, with such earnestness and emotion as rendered her more beautiful, and him more in love than ever, that she was not indifferent to his kindness and generosity, but would never, never make so bad a return for them as selfishly to accept an offer which would cost him his father's affection and his own social position; thereby seeming to justify the former's cruel suspicions, and, it might be, affording himself occasion for future regret and repentance. His behavior taught her to regard his honor and welfare as paramount to everything; she should always think of him with the warmest friendship and gratitude, but—but he must see that more was impossible. If he couldn't love his cousin (and she repressed as ungenerous an involuntary thought that he might have mentioned that obstacle before), there were many girls, cleverer and better than herself, who—who would be proud to—return—and here the girl's speech came to a premature but highly effective conclusion: in other words, her overwrought feelings found relief in tears.

Of course this gave him an advantage, improving which he presently won from her an admission which a more generous man would have found doubly delicious from the self-sacrifice involved in her resolution; but I question if Mr. Bligh did not experience just a little twinge of mortification at the thought that she should be capable of surrendering him, under any circumstances. There are persons whom disinterestedness itself renders impatient, when it conflicts with their immediate inclinations—perhaps, also, because it implies a higher standard of conduct than they are capable of attaining. However, as the idea necessarily remained unspoken, and as, notwithstanding his professed apprehensions, he secretly entertained a pretty confident expectation of obtaining his own way in the long run, he did nothing to spoil the impression she had conceived of his devotion and magnanimity. And as Ruth, on her part, naturally thought more of the absorbing confession she had just listened to than its contingencies, and could not help hoping that, after all, the dean would relent—for what father could steel his heart against such a son?—the pleasures of the interview exceeded its pains; so omnipotent is the great passion, and so prone to ignore or put the best face on difficulties. Still, to its close, the girl adhered to her determination. Had his lot in life been an humble one, she said, she would willingly have shared it, but would never incur the reproach of dragging him down to a lower level of fortune. And with no more satisfactory understanding, but many mutual endearments, they parted.

He ought to have known better than to purchase an almost purely selfish gratification at the cost of what followed, which he might certainly have foreseen, if he had paused to calculate, instead of risking consequences; but, like most persons who act from impulse and have no fixed principle of honor, he was an habitual self-deceiver whose sanguine temperament persuaded him that things would fall out according to his wishes. Hence he half-willingly, half-involuntarily, under-estimated the real strength and scope of his father's objections, apprehending, at the worst, only a quarrel with and temporary alienation from him—which might be endured. He also duped himself with the hope that he could carry his point by committing himself irrevocably in the desired direction. As to Ruth and her friends raising any difficulties, or the probability of their being placed in a false or painful position by his conduct, he had, strange as it may seem, never once thought of it. Instinctively it appeared quite a matter of course to him that if he were willing to venture, other people should also be ready to take their chances. He was destined to be undeceived in both quarters—in one very speedily.

When, with some little exceptions, Ruth told her guardian what had occurred, he looked exceedingly grave: in his eyes the case assumed a very unpromising aspect, utterly unrelieved by the hopeful perspective of the young people. Independent of the point of honor at stake, towards which he was sufficiently sensitive, he thought the dean's disapproval the worst of recommendations to his son as a suitor, nor did the young man's disingenuousness in suppressing his cousin at all operate in his favor. Commending Ruth for her resolution and adding so many arguments in support of it as to make her very miserable and a little indignant, Mr. Blencowe inconspicuously put on his hat and walked over to the Hall, and there, in the absence of the Squire, took counsel with the old ladies. They were very much concerned, very sympathetic and generally emotional, but of course concurred in his opinion—it was clearly impossible to encourage Mr. Bligh's addresses in opposition to the will of his father: they should all become amenable to the suspicion of mercenary motives. He must be told so, and that immediately.

The reader may almost guess the sequel. Informed of this decision, Mr. Bligh had no other alternative but to admit its justice and to bring his visit to a summary conclusion; both of which things he did, and with a good grace, although the necessity for them affected him like a disagreeable surprise, for reasons already intimated, and though he was nettled by Mr. Blencowe's regretting that he had not, in the first place, applied to himself instead of Miss Gower,—which, her guardian remarked, might have spared the girl some pain, in a very delicate predicament. This reproof Mr. Bligh met by pleading the temptation of opportunity, and the irrepressible nature of his passion—as it happened a half-truthful explanation. But his impulsiveness by no means conflicted with tact, or hindered him from taking advantage of circumstances in minor matters, though he was rash, even to folly, in serious ones. So, though secretly chagrined, he behaved in such a gentlemanly and conciliatory manner—at once asserting the unchangeableness of his sentiments and apologizing for their disclosure—that Mr. Blencowe felt sorry for him and forgot to stipulate that there should be no farewell interview between the young people; the result of which oversight was that they obtained one and improved it by interchanging promises of mutual fidelity—with the proviso, on Ruth's part, that she should never be asked to ratify them at the altar until the dean approved; which Mr. Bligh pledged himself to effect, if it lay in his power, or, failing, to commit the event to time; always remaining constant to her, forever and ever.

He went away, then, and they heard nothing of him for more than a week; after which ominous silence, his uncle, Mr. Samuel Bligh of Soho Square, came to Thorpe Parva, ostensibly on a business-visit, but in reality to make certain inquiries in his brother's behalf; and also to volunteer certain explanations necessary to the full understanding of Mr. George Bligh's conduct, which the old dean was desirous of exposing, less in the interest of Ruth and her guardian, than the apprehension (and indeed suspicion) that they were his son's abettors and accomplices in his revolt against paternal authority. Then it transpired that there had been a violent quarrel between the two, ending in the literal fulfilment of the father's threats; in fact, the young man's distinct repudiation, unless he consented to marry his cousin. Nor was this condition so very arbitrary as it appeared; for though Mr. Bligh's statement was so far true that he had never exhibited any particular affection for the lady or paid her unusual attentions, still, on the other hand, he had certainly never raised any objections to the match, which had always been looked upon as a desirable family arrangement and foreordained conclusion; so that his acquiescence perhaps justified the dean in regarding the affair as settled, and undoubtedly in resenting a change of programme evidently dictated by sudden passion for another object, of whom he knew nothing (and therefore charitably imagined the worst). Concerning his niece, the architect volunteered very little information, beyond what was conveyed in the cynical remark that he supposed she had sense enough for one who was both an heiress and a beauty; but she really liked her handsome fiancé, and was greatly mortified by his behavior, which had so incensed her uncle that he (the speaker) verily believed that he would not forgive his son, unless he returned to her, and she set him the example. Nothing but the rashest infatuation (Mr. B. declared) could explain his anticipating any other result; or (he might have added) expecting to gain his ends by such folly and duplicity, the exposure of which were almost as inevitable as their failure. Undoubtedly his conduct had its origin in characteristic vanity and impulsiveness which had embarked him in his pursuit of Ruth without reflection, until it was too late, and rendered him equally unwilling to confess the truth about his engagement and distrustful of success if he did so; though the event would have been far less discredit and disastrous to him than the pitiful alternative he had adopted.

I do not care, at present, to enlarge upon Ruth's grief and humiliation at this notable discovery. She took it so to heart that it affected her health; and partly for that reason, partly to relieve her from the tattle and scandal incidental to the affair—which of course got wind and was sufficiently cackled about, in a village—it was arranged that she should go to London, on a visit to her grandfather, where we first had the pleasure of making her acquaintance. Neither she nor her guardian liked to acknowledge there was also a third reason—an apprehension of some successful attempt on the part of Mr. George Bligh to see or communicate with her, for he certainly re-appeared in the vicinity of Thorpe Parva, and, it was said, was seen looking about her favorite walks of evenings; also he sent her a letter which must have presented a great temptation to Mr. Blencowe's curiosity, though he returned it unopened to the White Lion Inn at—, where, it transpired, the writer was staying. He went away, however, without accomplishing his object, and they heard nothing of him until his uncle informed Mr. Blencowe that he had gone to Paris as already related—both gentlemen hoped for the purpose of forgetting his unlucky passion. He had some money, accruing from the fortune of his late mother, but very little, having spent most of it during his minority and afterwards: to all intents and purposes his future was entirely dependent on his father. So to Ruth's own personal distress was superadded the pain of knowing that he had really sacrificed his prospects in life to his rash and selfish but indisputable attachment; which, both now and hereafter, seemed to have intensified the constitutional fund of obstinacy which he doubtless inherited from the parent against whom it was now pitted. And the climax of mischance appeared to have arrived, when it transpired, through some indirect channel in connection with the Hall, that he had become almost desperately impecunious and was quite adrift in the world. These tidings of him were the last that had come to ear, about three months previous to his most unexpected return to Thorpe Parva, in company with the Squire—and the ladies.

OUR LITTLE GHOST.

BY LOUISA M. ALDOTT.

Oh! in the silence of the night,
When the lonely moon rides high,
When wintry winds are whistling,
And we hear the owl's shrill cry;
In the quiet, dusky chamber,
By the flickering firelight,
Rising up between two sleepers,
Comes a spirit all in white.

A winsome little ghost it is,
Rosy-cheeked and bright of eye,
With yellow curls all breaking loose
From a small cap pushed awry.
Up it climbs among the pillows,
For the "big dark" brings no dread,
And a baby's boundless fancy
Makes a kingdom of a bed.

A fearless little ghost it is,
Safe the night seems as the day;
The moon is but a gentle face,
And the sighing winds are gay.
The solitude is full of friends,
And the hour brings no regrets;
For in this happy little soul
Shines a sun that never sets.

A merry little ghost it is,
Dancing gaily by itself
On the flowery counterpane,
Like a tricky household elf;
Nodding to the fitful shadows,
As they flicker on the wall,
Talking to familiar pictures,
Mimicking the owl's shrill call.

A thoughtful little ghost it is;
And, when lonely gambols tire,
With chubby hands on chubby knees
It sits winking at the fire.
Fancies innocent and lovely Shine before those baby eyes—
Endless fields of dandelions,
Brooks, and birds, and butterflies.

A loving little ghost it is;
When crept into its nest,
Its hand on father's shoulder laid,
Its head on mother's breast,
It watcheth each familiar face
With a tranquil, trusting eye,
And like a sleepy little bird
Sings its own soft lullaby.

Then those who feigned to sleep before,
Lest baby play till dawn,
Waken and watch their folded flower—
Little rose without a thorn;
And in the silence of the night
The hearts that love it most Pray tenderly above its sleep
"God bless our little ghost!"

 urday, June 7, at 2½ P. M., in the office of THE INDEX, No 142
 St. Clair street, Toledo.

It is said that the formation of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Episcopal creed occupied a period from 1538 to 1571. That was at the rate of a little more than one Article a year. It takes much longer for a superstition to die than it does to grow.

Mr. Beecher does not see how any one "following the irresistible logic of Calvinism (that all souls are born in sin) dares to enter into the family state." Calvinism or matrimony?—that is the question for every logical Orthodox young lady and gentleman to consider.

A Church historian says that the Church of England was the result of a compromise between the spirit of the Reformation and the selfishness of Henry VIII. An error often is the result of a compromise; a truth never, for the truth is in its very nature uncompromising.

Professor Agassiz says that "all the English he knows he learned on the outside of a stage coach, from the conversation of two gentlemen, while on a seven-weeks' tour through England and Scotland; and what little spelling he knows he obtained by reading one of Sir Robert Peel's speeches through twenty times."

Mr. Beecher says that "it was the distinctive peculiarity of the teachings of the Savior that they could not be taken literally nor interpreted easily." Did it ever occur to Mr. Beecher that a man whose teachings are so ambiguous and so dark can hardly be an authority or infallible guide?

Col. Ingersoll says to Christians who bring forward Christ's miracles as proof of his special divinity: "The witnesses to these miracles have been dead nearly two thousand years; besides, their reputation for truth and veracity in the community where they lived is unknown to us."
 These objections, so pithily put, are certainly worth thinking about.

The Liberal Christian contains this statement:
 "We find that the chief end of man is to glorify God by keeping his commandments in this world as the ground of future blessedness." We dissent. God is in himself all-glorious, and we cannot add to his glory by anything we do.
 Man needs rather to glorify himself, by aiming at and striving after perfection. He should obey the moral law—which commands God as well as man—because it is venerable in his eyes, without reference to future or present consequences. Let us have religion divorced from sentimental adulation of God and selfish self-seeking of man.

Professor Agassiz recently delivered an address before the Woman's Club, in Boston, on Education. The Woman's Journal reports him as follows:—

"He said that he believed that boys and girls will be all the better if educated in separate institutions. He had worked all his life to have them together in our higher educational institutions, as that is now the only way to obtain education for woman; but however much he had so worked that way, he did not favor this plan.
 He did not think he could have been half so earnest a student if he had met young ladies in his class. He did not think there were any moral evils growing out of it, but there were attractions in the presence of the young ladies which do not stimulate in the direction for which he would go to the lecture-room."

The Christian Union, of which Henry Ward Beecher is editor, refused to insert in its columns an advertisement of W. F. Jamieson's new book, "The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic." The publishers say that the title of the book, which would be the conspicuous part of any advertisement of it, would be rather a "sweeping remark" for a paper like theirs to admit. It would indeed; but the truth behind the title may yet be so "sweeping" as to brush away the fears if not the very existence of the Christian Union.

Ralph Waldo Emerson has safely returned to his home in Concord, Mass., from his extended European tour, and was received with a warm welcome by his friends and neighbors. He went as far as Egypt. We wonder if he saw the Sphinx, and asked it any questions! We dare say that prodigious mystery might have found it as difficult to comprehend him as he it.
 But here at home we think we make a tolerably successful effort at comprehending him. At any rate we honor, respect, and love him. He is just seventy years old, but in soul a youth yet, and immortal as ever. Long may he dwell with us!

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage recently "made a few remarks," in one of his sermons, about politicians. We do not propose to interfere in behalf of his victims. This is what he said:—

"But there is one source of danger, and that is the politicians who are threatening the safety and the very existence of our institutions. Look out for their machinations. Ah, there are some of them here to-day! I can tell them by their bloated cheek, and bloodshot eye, and their lecherous lip. (Applause.) I know them! Ah, you are a miserable crew, you politicians!
 (Laughter and applause.) All you want is votes. But there is a storm of indignation and wrath arising that will sweep this fraudulent, drunken crew that hang around the city halls of our cities to political perdition, and then tumble them down into a deeper pit, where all thieves and pickpockets and adulterers have their eternal residence with Satan and Bill Tweed.
 (Sensation.)"

The Word is the title of a small but sturdy paper published every month in Princeton, Mass., and edited by E. H. Heywood. The editor says his paper "favors the abolition of speculative income, of woman's slavery, and war government; regards all claims to property, not founded on a labor title, as morally void, and asserts the free use of land to be the inalienable privilege of every human being—one having the right to own or sell only the service impressed on it. Not by restrictive methods, but through freedom and reciprocity, The Word seeks the extinction of interest, rents, dividends, and profit, except as they represent work done; the abolition of railway, telegraph, banking, trades-union, and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principle whereof has been paid in the form of interest."
 Mr. Heywood is certainly courageous, if not discreet, in undertaking so great a reform as this.

Rev. Dr. Fulton says that "the greatest of sins is the sin of unbelief." There is something so frank and sturdy, though so narrow, in the Orthodoxy of this man, that we cannot withhold from him our admiration and respect. His ligotory is at least honest and consistent, and he always hews to the line of his Calvinistic logic. If Orthodoxy be true, the greatest of sins is the sin of unbelief, and every one of its ministers ought to declare and enforce this point with the utmost persistency and rigor. They ought, every one of them, to be in favor of "Christianizing" the Federal Constitution and every State Constitution; nay, and all the schools, and every institution in the land. If "Christ" be the only "way of salvation" possible to men, and without him they will inevitably and eternally be "lost," then those who believe this should put "Christ" everywhere, and make him reign everywhere, and urge and even compel men to "confess" and "come to" him. This would be Orthodox honesty and consistency; and this would command the respect, while at the same time it would necessitate the opposition, of all who differ from them.

FREE RELIGION AND IRRIGLION.

A correspondent in another column asks if THE INDEX draws the line with sufficient distinctness between free religion and irreligion.
 The opponents of free religion have all along represented it as undistinguishable from and identical with irreligion, but for ourselves we have not been disposed to defend free religion against such accusations; for the dogmatic opponents of any cause are almost sure always to misrepresent it, and to try to defend it against their wilful and stupid misrepresentations like trying to throw water against the wind. But when a friend of free religion, or even a fair opponent, criticises it, we always feel like replying and endeavoring to meet their objections if possible.

Now it depends entirely upon one's understanding of what religion is, whether free religion is opposed to it or not. Free religion is opposed to dogmatic religion, first and last. Its very name implies this. Free religion is opposed to every kind of religion which is not scientific.
 Their are many species of dogmatic religion.
 The Romanist dogmatizes about religion—every body except the Romanist admits that. But the Protestant, in his way, dogmatizes no less about religion; so, too, does the so-called Liberal Christian. All these insist that religion is "revealed," not scientific. The Romanist says that religion is revealed to the Church, and that the Church is the only authoritative expounder of religion. We admit that historically he has a very strong case; and even logically, his first premise once allowed, his case is very conclusive. The Roman church is the oldest Christian church; it stands nearest to Christ, and has the most unimpeachable claim to apostolic succession. Free religion however denies its premises. It denies that Christ was the divine "revealer" of any thing. It denies that religion was ever committed to apostolic hands, that the Church was ever made its depositary in any special sense, that the pope is at all its infallible expounder.
 Free religion is certainly opposed to the religion of the Catholic church, and so far not only allows that it is but claims to be irreligious.

But, as opposed to Romanism, all Protestantism is also irreligious. The Church of Rome so regards it; it puts Protestantism and Free Religion in the same docket, and brings against them both the same indictment. Protestantism however is as dogmatic as Romanism. It denies the authority of the pope, but asserts that of the Bible. It says the Bible, not the Church, is the revealer of religion to man; the Bible is infallible, not the pope,—the Bible is the revealed word of God, and the supreme guide in all religious matters. But free religion denies the claim of Protestantism. It denies the authority of the Bible; it denies that that book is any more a "revelation" of religion than the Koran, or the Vedas, or the Zendavesta; it denies that the Scriptures are marked by any special inspiration above many other writings, both Christian and pagan; it denies that Moses, Isaiah, Jesus, and Paul were any more specially inspired than Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, Socrates, or Marcus Aurelius; it denies that religion is "revealed" at all, any more than philosophy, poetry, or art, but affirms that its truths are come at precisely in the same way that all truth is ascertained—by patient, careful, rational, natural, human processes. So far as free religion is opposed to all these peculiar claims of Protestantism, it does not object to being called irreligious. It does oppose the dogmatic religion of Protestantism, which, equally with the Catholic religion, is based upon the principle of authority; it opposes it, and seeks thoroughly to uproot and exterminate it.

We go a little farther still, and admit that there is yet one other aspect of this whole question under which the charge of irreligion may be brought against free religion; for we desire to get at the root of this objection, and to be entirely candid in admitting the full scope and force of it as against the attitude which, in our view, free religion holds to-day. There is a class of believers in religion—some calling themselves Christian, others not—who hold to "intuition"

as the basis of authority in religion. The human soul, they say, is the revealer of the truths of religion to each human being. The "facts" of religion they call the "facts" of consciousness. (God, immortality, they say, are revealed to men not from without but from within. Theodore Parker was the notable prophet of this school. He said: "I see the sun with my outward eyes; therefore I believe in its existence. I see the truth of immortality with my spiritual vision; therefore I believe in it." In the same way he and his school would prove the existence of God. Personally, we have a great deal of sympathy with the intuitionists. The advance they made on every phase of Christian protestantism was immense. To have transferred the basis of religious authority from the Christ, the Church, and the Bible, to the individual soul, was a step mightily progressive. It secured at least one stronghold for truth, which we believe will have never to be given up.

But the intuitionists are dogmatic. They affirm that intuition proves the truths of religion. If they would say that intuition impressively suggests those truths, that would do. If they would say that intuition, scientifically applied, is one of the methods of such proof, that would be still better. But the intuitionists, as a school, are not favorable to science in religion. They say they cannot consent to refer the truths of religion to the solution of science. Science says: "God and immortality are open questions; they remain yet to be proven." The intuitionists say: "Not so; these are facts of religion. Science cannot prove them; the soul irresistibly affirms them." Of course they do not allow that even the "soul" itself is an open question; that whether materialism or spiritualism be the truth, remains yet to be proven.

Now free religion does not hesitate to take issue with dogmatic intuitionism. Its method is science. Its cause is truth. It agrees to stand by what in the end shall be proven; but it does not step forward and declare now that God and immortality and the soul are all "facts" of religion, that they are established beyond all need of further confirmation. It does not say that there can be no religion except upon the basis of these "facts." Religion is no completed body of doctrines, few or many; it does not depend upon anything particular in the future, but upon everything in the present—not upon what may be, but upon what is. It is a something which impels, and lifts, and draws humanity onward and upward, not something that binds it back or down to anything. If because free religion is opposed to limiting religion even to the belief in God it is therefore irreligious, so be it; it allows the charge. Free religion is opposed to whatever would limit religion to anything else than the Truth.

But free religion is not irreligious in this last analysis. What really exposes it to the charge of being irreligious, is that it is free. Men have been accustomed so long to associate religion with mental and spiritual bondage, with the yoke of some authority of some person or institution, that when it claims to be and really is free, it immediately in their eyes becomes synonymous with irreligion. But free religion is simply free religion. Yet it is no more free religion than it is free religion. Doubtless there are some who have become its champions, who rejoice more in the freedom than in the religion; and these say and do many crude and injudicious things. But such are quite as irrational as they are irreligious, and in this respect are hardly distinguishable from many over-zealous Christians. Free religion can stand these people; it can afford to endure its unwise advocates. Education and culture will be their cure. They have but just begun to think freely, and bel in their new-found freedom very much as horses do when eased from their irksome harness and turned out to grass. Let such "cut and aper" for a time; they will soon find that even freedom is only a means to an end—and that end the Truth.

And religion will live so long as TRUTH inspires men; and men will be religious so long as they love the Truth for its own sake, and honestly, earnestly, reverently seek it.

"WORLDLINESS" AND "OTHER WORLDLINESS."

It is frequently said by liberal thinkers that mankind need a religion that concerns itself with this world, and not with another world,—that the affairs of this life are supremely important, and that the other life, if there is any, will take care of itself,—that the interests of the present outweigh those of the future in their claim to attention, and that it is high time the anxieties, hopes, and fears connected with the possible destiny of men after death should no longer absorb the energies needed to carry forward the great work of promoting human progress here and now.

So be it. I heartily agree with that. I consider it a proof of the obdurate superstition of the multitude that the term "worldliness" should be popularly associated still with qualities the reverse of what it ought to stand for. The day has gone by when wise and reflective minds will turn aside with contempt from "worldly" affairs. So long as we are in this world, we should be of this world, and find in the interests and avocations of this present life enough to occupy profitably the total power of the human mind. I do not mean that it is necessarily foolish to speculate concerning the veiled future, or belittling to think seriously of the hidden goal to which the years swiftly bear us all. On the contrary, it is a mark of shallowness to shut off all meditation upon the great mystery of our origin and our end. Yet it remains true that he who fails to find the present a mine rich in precious metal, will find the future just as naked and empty. My being is defeated of its purpose, if this purpose must be indefinitely postponed. I believe it is not fated that I should wait till I am dead before discovering the reason for which I was born. Let me cleave to that conviction. Reason is the law of life because it is the law of universal Nature; and its divine satisfactions can be mine to-day, if I choose.

While, however, I coincide most fully with those who lay such emphasis on the now and the here, I am struck with a tendency in some of them to see in the now and the here only the least valuable part of their contents. The pendulum is apt to swing the full length of its arc. Because we are possessed with a profound sense of the wealth of the present, it is not noble to mistake gilding for gold, or take up too contentedly the shell of existence to the neglect of its pearl. Our appreciation of values should not be governed by mere considerations of place and time. Rate the present as greatly as you please; but rate it greatly because it is great, and not because it is near,—because it envelops the eternities in a moment, and condenses the ubiquities into a point, rather than because it holds us in its grasp.

It may be that the tenacity of life which "other worldliness" manifests in the history of religious thought has a root in the reason of things. All religions that have largely influenced mankind have always emphasized the best that humanity contains. The visions of heaven and hell which alternately delight and terrify the mass of worshippers have an ethical foundation, after all. With all their superstitions, the great religions teach men to prize the intrinsically precious,—virtue, truth, the best happiness. The yearnings of the human heart for ideal excellence run like threads of gold through the cheap texture of the mythologies, which thus vindicate their right to be. The task before us is to detach the valuable from the valueless, and transport the real beauty and worth of "other worldliness" into the sphere of "worldliness." We are to show that the scattered rays now shot out into the void spaces of the encompassing dream-land can be brought to a focus in our homes, and made to minister light and warmth hitherto unknown in the purification, the elevation, the beatification, of "the life that now is."

Until we succeed in filtering out the essential truth in the visions of the future which, it is too evident, have withdrawn men's minds unduly from the grandeur of their present, we shall expostulate in vain against the folly of the visions themselves. Put all the moral earnestness which makes the world hunger after a heaven of purity hereafter into the great task of realizing that purity now. The present is not so good as the future, if its nearness quenches the light of ideas. I count it a mere misfortune to be swallowed up in plans how to better the surroundings of life, and fill them with affluence, elegance, and comfort, to the neglect of that which is surrounded. I would rather still live the ideal life, though at the cost of cherishing some puerile beliefs. It is the noblest ambition of life to seek to foster the high quality of it, and transmute the dull metal of opportunity into the preciousness of golden character. To that must every one come back. It is well to turn away from the future, for the sake of making the present finer. But I believe in the use and the necessity of even "other-worldliness," unless the "worldliness" we choose by preference is marked by loftier aims put into purer practice.

In fact, whoever once glows with a genuine love of the ideal, and obeys it as the freely installed sovereign of action, will quite forget the antithesis of present and future, this world and the other world. Distinctions of time and space fade out of the mind that knows only the true and the right. This is better than a vehement rejection of future hopes even for present duties. The hopes are harmless, at the least. Abide by the duties, and, if you have the hopes too, life will be only the cheerier. The law that governs all worlds, both this and that, under and upper, will justify itself to all, if faithfully converted into habitual feeling, thought, and deed; and the "worldliness" that aims only to concentrate this law into immediate act is only another name for religion in its best aspect.

F. E. A.

Rev. Dr. Bellows (Unitarian) is sighing for a liturgy. He says he is tired of "the boldness and one-sidedness" of the Unitarian method. He is tired also of "running after liberty of conscience," having found himself, as he says, in this chase, "at the bottom of an open sack," from whence he desires now to emerge (it was fortunate the sack was left "open"). Coffee is good, he thinks, though it come out of an old coffee-pot; so is religion, he argues, though it come out of an old Prayer-book. He "never was so happy in his life" as when he sat once "for hours in a Catholic church, enraptured and immovable," beholding the "beauty and harmony of all things around" him. "I wish to mercy," he cries, "we had some symbolic form of worship!" By all means let Dr. Bellows have a liturgy. Let him have anything he wants, for he never wants anything long. Ecclesiastically he is as changeable and inconstant as April weather; though personally he is a whole-souled and generous man.

Henry Ward Beecher, in one of his lectures to the Yale divinity students, said: "Take common folks as they are, and my own impression from my acquaintance with them is that there are very few outside of Christian churches that generate many moral thoughts, religious thoughts, or religious impulses. The higher feelings are extremely weak in them." But does not Mr. Beecher know that most of our great public sinners, like the Credit Mobilier ones, for instance, are Evangelical Christians; that nearly all the inhabitants of our penitentiaries are hangers-on to the Church in some shape or other, and that a great majority of murderers expiate their crimes with Evangelical confessions on their dying lips? If the religious census of the immoral and criminal could be taken, there is little doubt that it would show a vast less number of infidels than Christians among them.

Mr. John Alexander, of Philadelphia, who wants to "put God into the Constitution," has made the following solemn declaration: "By the grace and providence of God enabling me, I will contribute to the treasury of the National Association for securing the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, the sum of five hundred dollars, annually, until an amendment (in substance such as at present proposed by the Association) shall be made to the Constitution of the United States. If this amendment is not made during my lifetime, I shall hope to continue the aforesaid annual payments through the agency of the legal representatives of my estate. 'I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.'—Chicago Post.

THE ONE CURE FOR THE SOCIAL EVIL.

The prevalence of sensuality in the grossest forms,—the general looseness of thought and feeling, no less than of practice, in regard to the sexual relations,—calls for the earnest attention of every man and woman who care for the health, happiness, and ennobling of our kind. One need but allude, in briefest terms, to the outward symptoms that tend to prove how rotten at the core, in this respect, is become society, low and high. Aside from the statistics of prostitution, the frequent tragedies (of which the names Hlcox, Bowlesby, Goodrich, recall certain types), and the fearful though less loud-mouthed witness which the madhouse bears,—aside from these, is it not a terribly alarming fact that "respectable" journals give place in their columns to the flimsily-masked advertisements of butchers of unborn babes? Nay, worse; that busy pimps of Satan are at work thrusting their obscene tracts into the hands of little children on their way to school? It is idle to linger mourning over such a state of things, or to waste breath in denunciation of the sinners. Let us ask, rather, what is the cause, and what the cure of it all.

The procreative appetite is, of itself, tremendous, and hard enough to control and hallow under favoring conditions; but left untrained and unsanctified in early years, it sways man's whole being with despotic power. And one chief reason of its usurping the ascendancy is that boys and girls are permitted to grow up in ignorance of its true meaning and sphere. It is a mistaken delicacy, a disastrous blunder, to ignore this subject in our system of education, and leave our children to pick up the vilest possible notions from servants, playmates, and multitudes of printed sheets full of insidious influences. Knowledge must precede virtue, for no chance act can be a moral one. Yet parents habitually leave this to chance,—which often becomes mischance, or something more calamitous. The little ones come with trustful, innocent questionings, only to be evaded, snubbed, or lied to—a shameful outrage on their right of knowledge. Keen-eyed, they quickly discern that here is a tabooed subject, on which their parents (who ought to be their confidants in everything) will not let confidence subsist between them; and so, with heightened curiosity, they turn elsewhere for information,—and get it, too, in no "questionable shape," but in one beyond all question damnable.

And what are we going to do about it? Palliate as we may the present evil, there is but one radical remedy: strike at the root! Teach opening, stainless minds the truth. When they seek (as they will seek) of their natural heaven-appointed teachers, in God's name let them find! Answer their home-questions frankly, reverently. "To the pure all things are pure;" and the divine miracle of reproduction set forth plainly, tenderly, by father or mother, cannot defile the soul of their inquiring offspring. "What God in his infinite wisdom, power, and love, has created, no man or woman should be ashamed to think of, read of, talk of, learn, and teach; for it cannot be that he has so ordered it that knowledge essential to the well-being of mankind can sully moral purity." Remember how permanent are first impressions, and let virtue pre-occupy the soul. Sow wheat betimes, else the Devil will get in ahead of you a full plant of tares. Therefore, seize with solemn joy the opportunity to stamp forever upon the plastic minds of children high and holy ideas touching the origin of human life. Teach them fearlessly the best you have learned yourself; trust them, and your faith shall receive a rich reward.

But inasmuch as not all parents are wise enough to adopt this course, I hope we shall yet have sexual physiology and hygiene taught in the public schools by pure-minded, capable men and women. Let us see to it that those who are to be the wives and husbands, the fathers and mothers, of the coming race have clearly defined ideas and firmly established principles as to that function on whose proper exercise the perpetuity and progress of our species rest. Let us make our children, as it is their right to be, heirs of the experience of all the ages. Let them learn, from the outset, to forego all mere passion indulgence (no matter whether legally sanctioned or illicit) as neither more nor less than licentious in the sight of Heaven; and so holding their reproductive nature as the most sacred of trusts,—having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but mastering their own desires in sanctification and honor, walking after the spirit in the glorious liberty of the children of God,—to become the parents of a more divine humanity. Thus shall we apply a constitutional treatment to every form of the "social evil;" a treatment slow, no doubt, in its operation (like all true remedies), but infallibly sure.

A FRIENDLY WORD.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—While acting in your present position, it may be pleasant to you to learn from new sources the effect of your own and Mr. Abbot's efforts in behalf of Free Religion.

Two or three months ago I was led to subscribe for your paper by certain quotations from its columns, which appeared in the New York Independent: you have reason to thank it for its involuntary advertisement of THE INDEX. My first perusal of your paper roused a deeper thrill of interest, a more heartfelt gratitude in me, than any paper or book I ever read before. I learned for the first time that true men were boldly speaking what I long had been timidly but irresistibly pondering. It was indeed a comfort to see the conviction in print, that a man may be good and yet not have "faith," in the ordinary religious sense of that word.

You may be sure I at once put into effect what for years had been meditated, and finally decided upon; namely, a withdrawal from church-membership. Since then I have known a joy and peace such as is often spoken of by the young Christian convert, and which doubtless is occasioned in both cases by obedience to the dictates of conscience. Even while separated in belief from every one of my relatives and friends, there is an inward satisfaction which entirely compensates for the estrangement. Indeed I feel that after groping for the key of life for more than a decade of years, it is suddenly felt within my grasp. By means of it I am enabled to unlock many of the questions of the age, whose apparent contradictions had almost driven me mad. By it I can perceive the one common foundation upon which all good men, of whatsoever divergent or opposing creeds, have rested in the past and are now standing. The justice and love of God are revealed to me in a light more glorious than ever shone forth from Scripture. To impart this blessing to souls as untroubled as mine has been, seems now a most pressing duty.

In examining your paper with the impartial eye of a stranger, with your permission I will mention a few of the points that impress me. Do you draw the line with sufficient clearness between free religion and irreligion? In an article by Col. Higginson, it was noticeable that all the members of the Maine Legislature who had "no religious preferences" were classed as liberals. Perhaps if he went to the State-prison he might find even a larger proportion who are without any "religious preferences;" would he claim these reprobates as his co-workers in the vineyard of the world? Bigotry with high moral character is better than liberalism conjoined with vice.

L. F. C. GARVIN.

LONSDALE, R. I.

[The writer of the above made some allusion in his letter to "THE INDEX troubles," discriminating as to both sides of the controversy; but he will pardon us for not publishing that portion of his very friendly communication, as we think sufficient attention to this subject has already been given in these columns.—Ed.]

INFORMATION WANTED.

The writer of this is equally interested and as much concerned in this life, and in that which is to come, as the profoundest religionist that now lives, or that has ever lived. He is no scoffer, neither is he a bigot, but strives after a sincere knowledge of the truth. He makes this disclaimer in advance, because it is too common with some to lavish unkind epithets upon those who unhapily may not agree with them. If I am mistaken I want the mistake corrected; if not, I should like to know how so great an error ever obtained such an influence over the minds of men, as the following.

If I correctly understand the leading dogma of Christianity, it is that the transgression of Adam in the Garden of Eden, or Paradise, necessitated the coming of Christ, whose crucifixion was a vicarious sacrifice for the sins of the world. To use the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 22), "For as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive."

Christians say that the evil effects of this transgression passed over from Adam to all his posterity. "In Adam's fall we sinned all." Now I cannot find that any of the patriarchs—that Moses, David, or any of the prophets, or Christ—made any allusion to, or deemed of any importance, or taught that Adam's transgression affected mankind at all. On the contrary I find that this doctrine or dogma—the very cornerstone of Christianity—lay dormant or had no existence for a period of four thousand years; that is from Adam to Paul,—and that it is from the mouth of St. Paul we first hear of it. Where did he get it? If neither the Jewish Bible nor the Gospels teach it, it appears to me that the dogma of the effects of Adam's transgression falls to the ground; and with it the other dogma that is built upon it—the vicarious atonement of Christ.

FREE SPEECH DEFENDED.

PORT HURON, March 22, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

A meeting of Spiritualists and Liberals was held at the Spiritualist Hall on the 20th instant, and after full and free discussion the following Preamble and Resolutions were passed; and in accordance with the instructions of said meeting I forward you a copy, requesting you to publish the same.

Whereas, Victoria C. Woodhull, president of the National Association of Spiritualists, and Tenable C. Claffin and Col. Blood, her partners and associates in the City of New York, have lately had their property seized, their persons rudely treated, and been cruelly incarcerated in an American jail, by servants of the people, in the name and under the pretence of law,—all at the instigation of one Comstock, a tool of the American Protestant order of Jesuits, otherwise called Young Men's Christian Association,—simply because they exercised the liberty of speech and freedom of the press to expose the hypocrisy, libertinism, and social corruption of certain great leaders of religion and morality; therefore Resolved, That we believe that Mrs. Woodhull and her co-laborers—in the enunciation of their views on the social relations of life, and in their bold and fearless exposure of the naked truth in regard to the moral vices who in sheep's clothing and the name of the Lord are debauching and corrupting public sentiment and opinion—are honestly and sincerely laboring to purify and elevate humanity.

Resolved, That we hereby solemnly protest against this high-handed usurpation by the servants of the people, who dare violate the Constitution in suppressing the freedom of the press and liberty of speech.

Resolved, That we tender to our sisters and brother our deep sympathy, and we pledge ourselves to do all in our power to sustain and support them under their difficulties.

Resolved, That we deeply regret the silence of the Banner of Light, and the denunciations of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, both of which papers should have come promptly to the aid of their sister editor and Spiritualist in the hour of her distress; and that they can only regain our confidence and support by a prompt and earnest acknowledgment and advocacy of liberty of thought and freedom of speech and press.

Resolved, That these resolutions be signed by the President and Secretary of this meeting and forwarded to Woodhull and Claffin's Weekly Banner of Light, Boston Investigator, INDEX, and the Religio-Philosophical Journal, with a request that they publish the same.

L. S. NOBLE, President.

E. R. SEELY, Secretary.

[The publication of the foregoing Resolutions has been unintentionally delayed.—Ed.]

THE SITUATION ACCEPTED.

EDITOR INDEX:—

After having passed through the experience of a Universalist and Spiritualist preacher, editor, and author, and seen the tendencies of various modern scepticisms, I have taken Evangelical Christian ground, and am now laboring in the churches to meet the issues between Christianity and infidelity. Hence I need THE INDEX to help keep me posted. While I commiserate your prospects in the godless battle you have begun, I commend your candor and vigor as worthy of a better cause.

Yours,

CHELSEA, MASS.

URIAH CLARK.

[We are very grateful to Mr. Clark for his "commiseration" of us, and will try to stagger along under our unworthiness as well as we can. We are glad he has decided to read THE INDEX; it will undoubtedly do him good.—Ed.]

UNITARIAN MINISTERS.—It may be laid down as an axiom in life that you never can tell what a Unitarian minister will do. He may begin in a pulpit, pass through a professorship or an era of school-teaching, and burst forth in mature life into a statesman, a diplomatist, a governor or a senator,—as Everett, Bancroft, and Palfrey did. He may leave his parish to found a phalanstery, as George Ripley and William Henry Channing did; or turn Catholic, like Bronson, and seek to bring all America under the control of the Latin Church. He may go to war like Higgluson, serve a writ of ejectment on Christianity like Abbot, revolutionize the politics of a State like Starr King, found a school of writers and thinkers like Emerson, grapple single-handed with the social questions of a great city like Parker, organize a sanitary commission like Hellows, go about rending churches in twain like Conway, or building them up, of the Anglican pattern, like Bishop Huntington. But wherever he is, be he a great man or a little one, he is pretty sure to be making a stir in some way or other—with his will or against it. The most quiet and icy of Boston Unitarians may prove, under favorable circumstances, to be a genuine volcano; he may alternate between a crater and a glacier; he may pass his hot youth in the coolest seclusion, and appear in his mellow age as a glowing radical, like Dr. Bartol; or he may take his radicalism in youth, with the measles and the mumps, and settle down into a conservative doctor of divinity. As Emerson says (with a slight variation to suit our subject): "Let mankind beware when God lets loose a Unitarian minister on this planet,—then things are at risk."—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

An Indiana Sunday-school man writes to a Bible firm in New York: "Send me on some Sunday-school papers and books. Let the books be about pirates and Indians as far as possible."—Chicago Post.

PROGRESS IN JAPAN.

Japan is evidently advancing rapidly in a career of reformation and material improvement, but we have seen no such evidence of its being "Christianized" as some of the press would have the world believe. The connection between telegraphs, railroads, and religion is about as direct as lake navigation or ocean shipping. We suppose the Japanese can possess all these things and still remain Buddhists. What they have done, so far as the rulers are concerned, is to admit all creeds alike into the country, and given them equal protection. That simply demonstrates that the government has finally elevated itself to the level of common sense; but proves nothing more. Nations are neither made nor changed in a day. The old forms are likely to linger for centuries in the open country.

In accepting our civilization, these pagan nations will be wise if they do not take too much of it. They will find that when sifted to the bottom, it is scarcely a remove from organized hypocrisy. The mass of civilized virtues are atmospheric. They make noise enough, but beyond the din there lies a deep gulf. As a rule, organization has not failed in promoting universal honesty and education, or developing most of the higher and nobler qualities of the race. Its weakness and follies have grown from its stationary condition. In waiting out the world, it walled itself in. It must now submit to new tests, and, on an average, need not dread them. It can show much that is superior to everything civilized. If truly wise, the aim will be to imbibe only what is fit and good, and reject the balance. It is in the power of Japan, in time, to become the England of the Pacific ocean, and that end will probably be attained if the country is not meddled with too much.—St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer.

STAYING IN TO REFORM.

To the Editor of the Golden Age:—Henry Ward Beecher welcomes the Nation with Mr. Godkin back into the ranks of the Republican party, saying, "The best way to reform a party is to stay in it."

We suppose, then, that Jesus stayed in the Jewish Church to reform it; that Luther kept in Rome to reform Rome; that the Wesleys held on to the Established Church to reform that; that the New England Fathers stayed in Old England and kept in the persecuting Calvinistic Church as the surest way to plant New England Liberal Congregationalism; that Mr. Garrison, Mr. Phillips, Gerrit Smith, and Henry Ward Beecher kept in the old Whig and Democratic parties as the surest way to circumscribe and overthrow slavery! How singular that men who have played the role of reformers for twenty-five years by seceding from others, should so strenuously object to being reformed themselves! It is easier, we imagine, to ask other people to come out and repent than to repent himself.

H. P. C.

BROOKLYN, July 2, 1872

WHY JEWS DON'T PROSELYTE.—We are not and never can be propagandists, in the Christian sense, because we sincerely believe that it is by the life, and not by the creed, that men are judged. It is an old saying of our rabbis that the pious of every nation have a share in future bliss. Holding to this belief, we do not regard it as our duty to propagate our creed, even if we had the influence and the numbers to devote ourselves to such a wild scheme. Jews never court proselytes. A good man is no better by becoming a good Jew. It is the goodness, after all, which has the saving power, whether the man be Jew, Christian, or Mohammedan. We have nothing but praise and admiration for Christians who work to lead men to better life—who are carrying our Bible and theirs throughout the habitable globe, that its light may warm the ignorant and redeem the vicious. In the Christian's labor of self-sacrifice, the Jew, too, may join at no very distant date. Hitherto, we have not had time to grow and flourish. Scarcely have we rested our feet and acquired a little influence, before presumably Christian kings have pounced upon our treasures, and cast us into prison or exile. We do not bear them any ill-will on that account, for they religiously supposed they were fulfilling prophecy by spitting on us and plucking our beards; but it was a little unjust thus to knock us into the mud and blame us for being smeared with dirt. However, that day is past. At present, we have work enough to purify ourselves, rather than cleanse the Hottentot. Let us live quietly in America for fifty years more, and if our people are true to themselves, who knows what sublime schemes of propagandism they shall originate?—Jewish Messenger.

HIT.—Apropos of fairs, and their frequently very questionable devices for raising money, we copy the following story from an exchange: "A Presbyterian minister of a Western town was once accosted at a fair of his church, where some of these expedients were in full blast, by no less a personage than the well-known Dean Richmond (afterwards President of the New York Central Railroad, but then known to be a habitué of the gaming-table), in this fashion: 'Domine, I don't exactly understand all your games here, but I would like to help the cause along. If you've no objection, I'd like to go into one of those side rooms and try a game of poker with you, the winnings to go to the church anyway.' The parson squirmed a little, but the church game of blanks and prizes disappeared from that branch of Zion forthwith."

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY," together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toilsome attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—such like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address

NOTES AND AN INTRODUCTION
BY PROF. T. P. MOSES,

OF YERKES UNIVERSITY.

1 volume, crown 8vo. $1.50.

"In this charming treatise, M. Emile Saigy gives a very lucid account of the latest mode of speculating on the Physical Facts of the Universe. It is a mode which may be described as bringing all the resources of modern science to the proof of the fact that the human mind is incapable of any intelligible conception of physical facts which does not resolve itself into matter and motion. There is in fact but one science under many names, and that science is mechanics. Atoms, and the laws which regulate their movements,—this is all our material universe."—Blackwood's Magazine.

THE LITERARY WORLD,

A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1872. It contains the ablest and most trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers.

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorial, brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, says: "I have been a constant reader of this paper, the LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deference to its judicious counsel, I have purchased of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiment in this direction seems to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared."

The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

The Averill Chemical Paint.

THE HANDSOMEST AND MOST DURABLE EXTERIOR PAINT.

Costs Less, and will Outlast any other.

Gen. G. R. Smith, Sedalia, Mo., writes:—"Two coats of 'Averill' covered better, and looked finer, than three coats of Lead and Oil, with a coat of varnish thereon. I would not again use Lead and Oil were it given to me."

Levi Shaw, Trustee of the Society of Quakers, Mt. Lebanon, writes:—"The buildings painted with the Averill White Paint some three and a half years since, I have examined, and found it retains the gloss nearly if not quite as well as when first put on. It is the best paint we have ever used."

Three Important Books

FOR THINKING READERS.

Oriental Religions,

And their relation to Universal Religion. India. By SAMUEL JOHNSON. 8vo. 802 pages. $5.00.

"The reader who is curious in the history of opinions, will hardly find a more instructive guide in the obscure labyrinth into which he is tempted by the study of Oriental reasonings and fancies. Mr. Johnson has thoroughly mastered the subject of which he treats, by the thoughtful researches of many years."—New York Tribune.

Enigmas of Life.

By W. R. GREG. 1 vol. 12mo. $2.00.

Contents.—Realizable Ideals; Malthus Notwithstanding; Non-Survival of the Fittest; Limits and Directions of Human Development; The Significance of Life; De Profundis; Elsewhere; Appendix.

"The whole set of essays is at once the profoundest and the kindest that has for some time tried to set people a-thinking about themselves and their destiny."—Daily Telegraph (London).

Literature and Dogma.

By MATTHEW ARNOLD. 1 vol. 12mo. 1-30.

In the preface of this remarkable book, Mr. Arnold says: "An inevitable revolution of which we all recognize the beginnings and signs, but which has already spread, perhaps, further than most of us think, is falling the religion in which we have been brought up." The book itself is a notable sign of this revolution. It is written with a very earnest purpose, with great vigor and suggestiveness of thought, and with that perfect clearness of style which distinguishes all of Mr. Arnold's writings. Its publication is an event in the history of religious literature.

The "INVESTIGATOR" is devoted to the liberal cause in Religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have explored its unknown shores. Believing that life is but a mortal to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life only. It has just entered its 45th year, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader! please send your subscription for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the "INVESTIGATOR" is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer.

The Radical's Root.

A SERMON PREACHED IN LYRIC HALL, NEW YORK, APRIL 27, 1873.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

"Rooted and grounded in Love."—EPHESIANS III. 17.

Everything that lives has a root. The plant draws sustenance from two worlds—a world of darkness and a world of light, and as much from one as the other. Even the air-plants, as we call them, that seem to live entirely on the light and the atmosphere, still derive their nourishment in part from tangible substances. They live without moisture; would you make them grow in your hot-house, you must provide something, though it be nothing more than a piece of decaying wood, a lump of charcoal, or a few mossy stones, to which they can attach their tenuous roots. So foolish a thing as the rose of Jericho, which flourishes all over the East—in the Barbary States, in Palestine, and Upper Egypt, lingering by the side of streams, enjoying moist places—a plant that in the dry season pulls its tiny root out of the ground, curls it tightly round its body, and rolls off before the wind until it finds a congenial resting-place, nevertheless has its suckers which it unwinds and drops down when its pleasure serves; and it always chooses a succulent spot near a stream of water, in a bed of mould, or on a heap of muck. The higher the growth upwards, the deeper the root downwards. Plants that live near the ground need but a feeble hold on the soil. An inch or two of earth suffices. They need not spread at all; they need only dip. The stem of the crocus and of the violet is very short; a child can pull them up with its fingers; they need no depth of soil. But the great tree that overshadows half an acre, that takes in the sunshine of the whole heavens, and is refreshed by the winds that blow from all the quarters of the globe, reaches down furlong upon furlong; its roots are a subterranean forest stretching out great branches that twine and grasp like anacondas, and appropriate the vitality that ages have deposited. The oak tree that is to last perhaps a thousand years, under whose shade generations of children are to play, draws the nurture that sustains it from an area wider than it spreads over in the sky; it lays hold on the very heart of the planet, coils about huge rocks beneath the earth, ties itself in with the knotted roots of other trees, goes plunging and burrowing down towards the centre of the globe in search of things that died centuries before and are hastening into mould; prowls after the hidden springs of water, finds where the sweetest fountains are, and will even plunge beneath them, pushing its greedy inquiries beyond their ken, levying on other territory that they may perchance have treasure of food for it. All the force of man will not start a mountain-pine. The tempest of the winter but strips off its leaves; the earthquake that tumbles down the swellings of a city does not loosen a single one of its fibres: it is an organic thing; a piece of Nature; the upper world of light and glory clothes it annually with the splendor of a new creation; the under-world, cloudy, dark, and secret, but full of living forces, pours into it the products of all the growth of the planet for a thousand generations.

The analogy holds in regard to human beings. Every individual man and woman has a root; and the grander the growth of human qualities, the deeper is the root. The person who overlooks his generation you may be sure overlooks his generation as well. He whose shadow falls across centuries draws his sustenance from more centuries that have gone before him and have left no trace save in the wealthy world out of which he sprang. According to the height of the character is the depth of the source whence it draws supplies. Here is a man who is rooted to circumstances,—in the upper, superficial stratum of things adjacent to him;—what we call the conditions of his life, the external apparatus by which his existence is kept in order, furnish the soil he is grounded in. He depends upon those. His fibres strike no deeper than his accidents. Is he rich,—he blossoms and bears fruit. Is he poor,—he dries up, shrinks away, perishes. In prosperity he shoots up tall, spreads his branches wide, waves his leafage in the air; adversity strikes him, the foliage is all stripped off, the branches toss idly in the wind, the trunk aways wildly hither and thither, the roots are loosened: if a severer gale than usual strikes him, he is laid prone on the ground. Is he successful, success feeds him, elates him, makes him happy: his veins are full of sap; his eye is bright; he holds his head high; his hand is open. Is he unsuccessful, all the geniality is gone;—no more light in his eye,—no more buoyancy in his step,—no more uprightness in his form; his mind has lost its balance; his heart is dead. Here is a man who, in the season of popularity, is open-minded, bright-hearted, happy, warm in his affections, generous in his impulses; he seems to be ennobled by the regards of his fellow men. Is he unpopular,—the withdrawal of the sunlight of common favor, the withholding of the praise of ordinary people, take from him the very breath by which he lives; and he blackens and dies. To be born at the North was once to be a democrat; to be born at the South was to be an apologist for the peculiar institution. In England, this man believes in monarchy. In Paris, he praises imperialism or republicanism, according to circumstances. In Protestant countries, he is a Protestant; in Papal countries, a Papist. In Mecca, he puts off his shoes before entering the sacred precincts, and kisses the black stone. His faith is that of the country he sojourns in; he worships with the multitude, whatever their superstition; he is as he happens to be; like the chameleon, he takes the color of the ground he lies on, some say of the food he eats; he is a rose of Jericho, always hurrying before the wind, his roots in his trunk. If he has roots, nobody knows where they are until, occasionally, for a moment, he finds it convenient to pause and to pump up a little sap into his body from the place where he happens to find himself.

Here is a man with a deeper root, a root in his ancestry. He is a leaf on a family tree. He refers back to his precursors; is proud of their blood in his veins,—the red blood, the blue blood, that father, mother, or some more distant ancestor, furnishes. This man is mindful of the stock he springs from, the pit out of which he was dug. He carries himself with a proud consciousness of superior worth, if the stock be noble. A kind of nobility characterizes his look and manner. If it be ignoble, the characteristics none the less appear in him, and none the less is he proud of them; he boasts of their evil prowess, talks haughtily of their wild heroism, exults in their questionable achievements, quotes their strong sayings, tries to carry himself as their descendant and representative. There is a good side to this pride of ancestry, if the ancestry be worthy; but there is a bad side to it even then. The material that a man derives from his ancestry, however rich, does not make him human in the noble sense; it shuts him in with a few qualities; it makes him reserved, exclusive, opinionated, imparts to him the characteristics of the cast he belongs to. In fact, the cast spirit itself is due to this narrow veneration; for it confines men to certain sharply defined types which clash with each other, and cause incessant friction and war. On the whole, root of ancestry is a bitter one, and the fruit it bears is bitter.

Let us suppose a man to strike his roots lower down than this. He is not, we will say, the creature of his circumstances; he is not the child of his parentage. He belongs to his nation; he is an American, or German, or Frenchman, or Englishman. His suckers spread out to the limits of the national domain. He is not bounded by State lines. He does not ask whether his neighbor comes from the East or the West, the North or the South; he is countryman, and that is enough; he is blood of his blood, and bone of his bone, a fellow, an equal, and a brother, sacred in his person, and venerable in his rights. Such a man will be large, expansive, and generous. He is the patriot; full of noble sentiments; a man of comprehensive sympathies and wide interests. He can take his brother American by the hand wherever he meets him, be he rich or poor, fortunate or unfortunate, attractive or forbidding. The fact of belonging to a common country covers a multitude of infirmities. It cannot be denied that a certain grandeur of intelligence, a certain faith in ideas, a certain breadth of allegiance to principles, accompanies this patriotic type. But neither can it be denied that such a person has his limits. He believes in American ideas, but in no others; he praises American principles, but concedes worth to none besides; you may always know him as a man who exults in his native land so cordially that the foreigner is a barbarian. For has he the same feeling to the Englishman? Does he equally respect the German? Has he a profound respect for the Frenchman? Can he enter sympathetically into the feelings of the Italian or the Irishman? Not so. He is possibly a bigot in his prejudices, unable to appreciate the intellectual or moral weight of a fellow man who lives on the other side of the Atlantic or the Pacific sea. In England he has no eye for what may be the advantages of a constitutional monarchy; in Germany he cannot welcome what may be said for the constitution of the Empire; in France he fails to understand the peculiar temper of a people that is constantly overturning its own system of government. He can cherish scorn for the stranger, having but one word for stranger and enemy. Noble, wide, grand in many respects, his root, nevertheless, is not so firm that it cannot be shaken,—by prejudice, passion, and malice. Should the time come when a controversy arises between his own government and another, the right is sure with him to be on one side; his motto is, "Our country, right or wrong," but still our country.

But now, suppose a man to strike down his roots lower than this,—below family, ancestry, class, clan, tribe, country,—down into human nature itself; not asking whether one be English, French, German, American, Italian, Irish, but whether he be human. Suppose a man to really make no distinction between Jew and Greek, barbarian or Scythian, bond or free, to consider simply this one question, whether the individual has the attributes of a human being: such a man has real roots. He is interested in what concerns his fellows. He strikes down into a principle. He draws sustenance from an idea. His sympathies are world-wide. He touches every person at the point where all touch each other. He can surrender himself to a cause. The question with him is, Is it just? Is it right? This is the noblest, the most exhaustive root of all. Deeper than this, deeper than human nature, it is impossible to go. When we see a man striking his roots down into this principle of human nature, we see one who strikes down into the core of things; we see one who is proof against the severest tribulations, sorrows, temptations. No wind can shatter him; no tempest can unseat him; he stands up under calamity, and even comes out stronger from the shock of the elemental war.

I am to speak this morning of the Radical's Root.

What do we mean by a Radical? There are three definitions of the term. According to the popular acceptance, the Radical is one who pulls up things by the roots—a destroyer, a revolutionist. This is the definition of the enemy. The genuine Radical rejects it as being no description of himself whatever. The Radical says of himself, "I come not to destroy, but to fulfil." He would pull up nothing by the roots that had roots to support it. He would let even weeds grow in his neighbor's field if the neighbor preferred them to grain: he has too much respect for things that grow to disturb them without cause; only the poisonous plants that corrupt the atmosphere and impoverish the land would he eradicate.

A second definition marks the Radical as one who never can rest until he gets at the root of things. The Radical is represented as a prying, inquisitive, critical, restless person, who is forever burrowing in the ground, can never be satisfied, can never leave any belief or institution alone, can never take a doctrine on trust, must impatiently pull up his corn to see how it grows; a man without intelligent motive, or earnestness of purpose, or serious desire after truth; inheriting a precious vineyard, which has produced luscious grapes for a hundred years, the delicious fruit whereof he has tasted, in health and in sickness, in clusters and in vintage, since he became a man, he must nevertheless worry and explore and expose the healthy suckers of his vines, that he may ascertain in what precise mixture of soil they are planted. Living in a house which has sheltered him and his parents before him, and a line of ancestors before them—a house that in generations has never started, does not show a crack in its walls or a leak in its roof—still he is not content until he has been down in the cellar, tested with the hammer every stone in the substructure, and carried on geological experiments beneath the foundation at the imminent risk of upsetting the building. This, too, I pronounce a caricature. This, too, is the definition of the antagonist. The Radical is no such person. That there are persons who do this may be true enough, but they are not necessarily Radicals. It is not the peculiarity of the Radical, that out of mere curiosity, in a spirit of restlessness, from an idle desire to know more than is useful, admissible, or wise, he would unsettle anything that has a valid claim to permanence. Whatever has a solid basis he allows to stand.

The Radical is simply one who desires a root, who believes in roots, is sure that nothing is strong without them, and is concerned to know in what sort of soil he is planted. He has no fancy for oaks planted in flower pots; pine trees set in porcelain vases are not to him beautiful. Knowing somewhat the uncertainty of the seasons, having had proof of the variableness of climates, he has no wish to be put down in a small area, fenced about on all sides, bricked closely in so that no draft can freshen the air and enliven the soil. He has discovered that in his daily life he must face the tempest and brave the blast, and he would make sure against being stripped by an autumn wind, or sapped by a trickling stream of water, or overturned by a sudden convulsion of Nature. He prefers to be able to stand, and, when the storm has passed, still to stand. He calls himself, therefore, what he is, a Radical—a root-man, because he believes in a root; the deeper the root, the more he believes in it; and his sincere desire, his only desire, is to know that his root goes down deep enough to hold fast amid the severest stress of weather.

The Radical, therefore, cannot be a sectarian. The sectarian stands planted in a sect; but a sect is a fragment—something cut off from the domain of thought, a small ground-plot, or yard, not an open field. The sectarian is a class or clique man; as the word signifies, a man who is clipped and trimmed down. He is a tree set in a box, not in a meadow. That he has a certain amount of verdure, that he bears a certain quality of fruit, that he has elements of earnestness, of intensity, may be cheerfully granted. Every human being has vitality of some sort; he will grow after a fashion, wherever you plant him; if you plant him in a small place, he will make the most of his opportunity, he will ripen to the extent of his limits. But if the limits are cramped, the stature will be stunted. The sectarian is an apple-tree planted in the cleft of a rock. Chance has put it there; no gardener is responsible for the situation; it makes the best of its handful of earth and thimbleful of moisture; struggles as well as it can to get at the light and air; rejoices, after a sickly fashion, in the sun, holds out its scanty leaf to catch the rain-fall, but after all can get no more sustenance than the conditions allow. The kind wind blows dust into the nook where the poor twisted body is; resolutely the root is let down, and painfully the sustenance there is drawn up, though it be but a mouthful. But you will see only a few wrinkled leaves. On the outermost twig perhaps you may discover a single apple, which never ripens, and, when bitten, proves to be sour. The sectarian has a certain amount of force of his own; but the sound he makes as he ripples along is out of all proportion to the volume of the stream; it is the rattle of a thin current of water flowing over loose pebbles. A very slender rivulet will turn a pretty large mill-wheel if you only make the channel narrow enough. But one can have no more life than his roots supply; the sectarian's mind, therefore, is narrow, dry, thin, and sandy. There is no great impulse, no eager seeking after the new truth. He holds up his little shred of doctrine, and it is not apparent to him that anybody else has any doctrine at all. His heart cannot be genial or diffusive in its charity. It is impossible for him to feel that other men who do not believe as he does are as good as he is; that they can be sincerely good at all. There is a certain amount of conscience, or of conscientiousness, rather; but it grinds away at the crank of the denominational organization, it turns the creaking wheel of denominational duty, and succeeds in bringing out a certain amount of hard grits which one can, perhaps, make into dry biscuit. He cannot worship with grandeur of devotion, for his deity is a definition, his God is a dogma. He can only catch a glimpse of the divine love at the bottom of a well as the sun passes over the mouth of it. His soul, therefore, is apt to be arid and barren as his mind; his love of God is love of his denomination, and the love of his denomination is but a species of the love of himself.

The Radical cannot be a sectarian. Can the Radical be a churchman? What is a church but a more comprehensive and better organized sect, a wider denomination, a more diversified group of believers? There is something grand, truly, in the idea of a church; in every existing church there is much that is noble, majestic, and attractive. A church is an organization, not a machine; it is a growth; it lives through ages of time; it covers a large area of space; it includes people of many conditions, many orders of intellect, many casts of disposition, many tongues, many types of genius, it may be many different races. It has developed in the course of centuries. There are worlds of experiences in it. Its spiritual soil is strong, and succulent with the joys and sorrows, the thoughts and desires, the aspirations and utterances of generations. Its doctrines are the products of disciplined minds working through many phases of faith. It has sacraments and ceremonies, solemn rites, glorious music, beautiful symbols, poetry, art, architecture. It has great churches, not meeting-houses, that seem to have grown by the laws of Nature out of the soil. To be rooted in a church is to have roots struck into historic and holy ground; it is to draw moisture from many living springs; it is to appropriate the experience, perhaps, of a nation. The churchman, so he be a true churchman, carries with himself an air of calmness and repose, of dignity and grace. He seems to be a part of the institution he belongs to; a piece of this great organism that has lived so long, and comprehended so much, and embraced such various life; something of the spirit of antiquity attaches itself to him. He is conservative; he has a great trust, a large reverence, an earnestness in thought and feeling that is even impressive and beautiful.

And yet the churchman, if he be no more than a churchman, is considerably less than human. What does he think of other churches? Of the Roman Church, for instance—of the Greek Church? What respect has he for strange forms of worship? Does he do more than tolerate extremes that differ from his own? Does he tolerate such as are hostile? The churchman's mind is slow and opaque; his heart is rather self-satisfied than sunny; his conscience rather punctilious than sensitive; his worship is formal; he prays as the Church prays—out of a book. He allows the Church to think for him, to believe for him, to worship for him, to intercede for him. The Church takes care of him; pardons his sins; guarantees his future. He treads an ecclesiastical path, passes through an ecclesiastical doorway, enters an ecclesiastical heaven. However pleasantly he talks with other believers, it is over a fence; however graciously he looks at them, it is with eyes of compassion. He cannot help believing that he is in a safer place than they. You are impressed by him, as by one who feels sure of his past, his present, and also of his future, and is good enough to be sorry that his fellow-men are not so sure of their destiny as he is of his. The ripeness of his belief prevents his being angular, but the interior composure of his mind savors too much of that calm exclusiveness which enjoys its spiritual privacy and keeps intruders out of doors.

The Radical cannot be a churchman. The Church is of comparatively modern origin, traceable to definite beginnings. It is a production of human wit; a creation of diplomacy. You can easily go below it, and get at the secret of it. The Catholic church claims to be older than the Bible. Is it older than the Hebrew Bible—to mention no others? The man who strikes his roots into the Old Testament, strikes them below the Church. The man whose roots go down into the soil of these antique Scriptures, penetrates below all Christendom. The Old Testament, the old Hebrew Bible—what a world it is! How wonderful in extent, in comprehensiveness! What wealth of antiquity there is in it! What recesses of wonder and marvel it contains! It covers a continent; it absorbs the life of a race, and one of the most extraordinary races that ever lived on the planet. There is in it a universe of thought, feeling, conviction, purpose; the experiences of two thousand years are packed away in its chapters. What mountain ranges of thought, what sweet valleys of meditation, what noble rivers of psalmody, what delicious fountains and pure rivulets of praise! What power of conviction! What reaches of exaltation, what breadth of hope, what vistas of anticipation, what thrilling conceptions of Providence, of the world that is and of the world that is to come! The man who should sink his roots so deeply into the Old Bible that they took up everything there, would be a giant among men. But all depends on the thoroughness of the exploration. Does one root himself in the letter, or in the spirit?—that is the question. He that roots himself in the letter does not go below the surface, hardly pierces the outer crust; knows nothing perhaps of the rich world of experience that is stored inside. Now, the Old Testament man, as we see him, roots himself in the letter. The Puritan rooted himself in the letter. He knew far less than he might of the resources of moral and spiritual sustenance that lay hidden in the spirit below the letter. The soil in which he struck his roots was made up in great measure of the debris of the Hebrew mind—wild feelings, fanciful speculations, strange superstitions and conceits, that are strewn broadcast over the surface of the history; uncouth beliefs in Providence, rude conceptions of God and man, grotesque notions of the constitution of the world, vagaries respecting the election of certain races of men, and the rejection of others; and the result of all this was a character of austerity and pride, touched here and there with a sweet and rich glow of piety, but having, as the soul of it, more reverence for law than truth, for justice than for love. The Puritan had a grand life in him, but it was rough and severe. He was exclusive, arbitrary, and at times tyrannical. He carried a rod of iron in his hand; his conscience was a rod of iron.

Go down below the letter in which the spirit is hidden,—sink your roots until you strike the New Testament, and you have something infinitely richer. The New Testament is the older, because it is the heart, the soul of the Old Testament. Was not Jesus a Hebrew; and what food did he feed on but that very Bible which we call the Bible of the Hebrews? What was his peculiarity, if not this: that he dropped roots down below the surface of the ancestral mind till they touched a secret core of inspiration in the heart of his race? Everything he had was there; every thought, every feeling, every hope, every anticipation—his trust, his faith in the Heavenly Father, his conception of the paternal Providence, his meekness,—they are all there. But with the subtle insight that he possessed, with the exquisite chemistry of his soul, he sent his roots underground; they ran out in every direction until they found those sweetest springs of water, and drew the sustenance thence that made them bud and blossom. When you have penetrated the secret of the Beatitudes, when you have got at the soul of the parables, when you have searched out the hidden thought in the Sermon on the Mount, then, and not before, you have touched the centre of power in the old Hebrew Bible. And when you have done that, you have struck into the richest soil that is offered to the spiritual nature of the Christian. He that will do this will plant himself in the heart of the New Testament,—not in the letter, not in the strange, crude, fantastical portions that are heaped upon its surface; he that, going down below all this,—below the errors, the mistakes, the superstitions,—finds his way into the heart of Jesus himself, will blossom and bloom into a life as exquisitely pure, sweet, and beautiful as is ever seen in Christendom. He will have the divinest qualities, and at the same time the most human; he will be able to submit himself to the Supreme, and to give himself to his brothers. Trust, patience, meekness, reverence,—he will have them all. Simplicity, purity, charity,—all these will be his. The Christian Radical roots himself in the heart of Jesus; not in his reported word, not his incidental thought, but in the heart of his heart. Beyond that, outside of that, he does not go. He explores none of the outlying regions of literature or philosophy. This beautiful Jewish life is enough for him.

And yet, is there nothing more? Is this absolutely all? Is the Hebrew race the only race to be taken into account? Does God give his inspiration to none but those who have lived in Palestine? Did Jesus exhaust humanity? Do we find everything in the New Testament that can be worked into human character? Other races have other gifts: one, the sentiment of beauty; another, the principle of justice; another, the passion for liberty; another, the devotion to ideal truth in science and philosophy. Is it forbidden to make excursions into the outlying literatures of China or of Greece, of Asia or of Persia, and to draw spiritual nourishment from those larger sources which, after all, belong to the human nature? They who can do that are the privileged; they who can do that are the strong. The true Radical, the Radical of the Radicals, sinks his shafts below sect, church, Bible, Old or New; below all partial experiences; down into the secret places where man has stored his treasures of thought,—and by all that, tries to live.

Orthodoxy is right thinking; but who can claim to think rightly? How is one to know that he thinks rightly? It is very plain that nobody thus far has earned a title to monopolize right opinion. To think rightly is to exhaust thought. No one can be truly orthodox so long as there is knowledge yet to be acquired. Only the Divine mind is orthodox, because only the divine mind is omniscient, and, being omniscient, entertains no error. Up to this day there is no human orthodoxy. He is most orthodox who thinks most closely to facts.

We speak of new truth. There is, correctly speaking, no new truth. All is old as God himself. There are new interpretations of truth, new guesses at truth, new insights into truth, new readings of truth; but the Truth is more ancient than antiquity: it is as old as the world; the last reading only comes nearer the first text. To be orthodox, therefore, we must need all the knowledge there is—of literature, science, art. The Radical accepts the last interpretation (so it be a satisfactory one), the last interpretation of the oldest truth. Those who accept older interpretations are further off from the original sources than he is. The Radical is one who uses the last invented plough for his tillage, because it subsoils the most thoroughly. What he wants is the original, primal truth; the truth that is symbolized in Nature, which the Infinite mind, in its first perfect operation, embodied in the universe.

The peculiarity of the Radical, let me say finally,—the test of the Radical's genuineness is not that he holds a certain class of opinions; it is, that he uses the opinions he entertains. It is not his peculiarity to question and doubt, to cavil and raise issues; it is not restlessness of mind; least of all is it flippancy, indifference, looseness or lightness of conviction. Let me declare again, he is not a destroyer. The true Radical is known not by his restlessness, but by his calmness; not by his flippancy, but by his seriousness; not by his indifference, but by his earnestness; not by his lightness of speech about great beliefs of mankind, but by soberness of speech about them. He is known by his patience, his cheerfulness, his serenity, his trust; the singleness of his purpose, the weight of his opinion, his freedom from prejudice, his openness to discovery, his thankfulness for light. He is one who stands deeply rooted and firmly planted. "He stands four square to all the winds that blow." His very name implies that he is rooted and grounded. He is rooted and grounded—not in prejudice or tradition, not in dogma or formula, not in sacraments or institutions—he is rooted and grounded in love that even passes knowledge.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

I have inserted the above suggestive dash, not without reason. For it soon appeared that to Mr. Edgecombe alone was owing the responsibility of the invitation, and that his sisters had, at first, strongly disapproved of it, but since resigned themselves to circumstances. A hearty, hasty, and rather capricious old bachelor, whose temperament often hurried him into inconsiderate actions, he had liked the young clergyman for his companionable qualities, and excused or palliated his misconduct; and accidentally encountering him at Boulogne, in imminent danger of a debtor's prison, he, moved purely by compassion and good nature, had rescued him from that catastrophe, and, not content with that, insisted on bringing him back to England and Northamptonshire. In answer to the objections of the spinsters, he declared it was a condemned shame that such a clever fellow should be allowed to go to the deuce merely because he was too high-spirited to sell himself at the dictation of an arbitrary old curmudgeon of a father, whose want of natural affection was a disgrace to his cloth. Suppose he had behaved foolishly, or, if they liked to call it so, deceitfully: was that any reason why he should bow to anything else with decency, owing to that idiotic rule of once a clergyman always a clergyman. He should accompany them to Thorpe Parva, and if parson Blencowe didn't choose to forget and forgive, and let the young folks come together—as, to be sure, they would be only too willing to do, when Bligh might become his curate, and in course of time succeed him as vicar—why he, Mr. Edgecombe, would find him a berth elsewhere. The ladies had used to say, how delightful this would be, if it were not for Bligh's superior prospects; now they no longer stood in the way of its realization, they (the spinsters) ought to jump at the opportunity. They were bewildered at such a very unlooked-for proposition, and such an unwonted defiance of all the proprieties.

They found, however, it was of no use remonstrating with their brother, who had, in fact, already committed himself in advance of their opinions. So together they came to England, and on the way Mr. Bligh made himself so agreeable to the spinsters as almost if not entirely to condone his offence; inasmuch that, if they did not positively acquiesce in the Squire's plans, they certainly manifested no repugnance towards them, merely stipulating that he should, for the present at least, confine them to his own breast; and, also, if nothing occurred to warrant the extension of the young clergyman's visit, that it should not be protracted longer than was necessary to provide for him elsewhere. The Misses Edgecombe were not without sympathy for the young people, suspecting, and indeed very justly, that notwithstanding her lover's duplicity, and her own suffering, Ruth had never quite succeeded in expelling him from her heart. Again, on consideration, there were other reasons for thinking the Squire's scheme less undesirable than it had at first appeared. As he observed, where was the use of crying over spilt milk? If Mr. Bligh had been to blame, had he not suffered for it? And if he wouldn't marry his cousin (supposing it still feasible), why should all the world copy his father's displeasure? In common with their brother, they had been greatly offended by the Dean's reported suspicions, which seemed to glance alike at the Hall and vicarage; and, hence, could not be expected to be very tender of his wishes. Then the ladies admired his son's preaching exceedingly, and were tired of Mr. Blencowe—who did, indeed, repeat himself fearfully, and was most conscientiously tedious in his references to chapter and verse; apparently believing those divisions to be inspired as well as the text. He was over seventy, and when, in the course of human events, it pleased Providence to remove him from the vicarage to the churchyard, their brother might certainly do worse than give Mr. Bligh the living; which, with his predecessor's savings, would afford ample provision for the young couple, whose gratitude and society would thus be permanently secured. So prattled the kind old spinsters, holding council together as to what was best to be done, and wisely determined not to interfere, but to leave the result to circumstances. And it was in this conjunction of them that Ruth returned to Thorpe Parva.

I have said that her first sentiments almost inclined her to immediate flight: in fact, she took her guardian to task for not forswearing her of Mr. Bligh's presence in the village, as he might easily have done, subsequent to the despatch of the letter which had brought her home; the party arriving at the Hall on the day after, and no less than three days elapsing before her return. But this Mr. Blencowe had abstained from doing, partly from a well-founded apprehension that he would thereby lose his nurse, by her remaining in town; partly from an unwillingness to acknowledge his own want of moral courage in conceding the Squire's request that he should allow Mr. Bligh to officiate for him next Sunday. The reader has already been informed that, though he loved his ward, the old clergyman was rather selfish, especially in personal matters; and not a cottager in the parish could have less idea of opposing the will of Mr. Edgecombe than himself. Then—I am almost ashamed to mention it, but such traits make up character—his acceptance of the Squire's proposal saved him a couple of guineas, that being the sum he would have had to pay for an hired deputy: all of which considerations caused him to act as we have seen, and risk exposing Ruth to the probability of still further mortification—unless she had her own reasons for anticipating some pleasant result from the return of her ex-suitor.

And this, as has already been inferentially admitted, was the case. After her first shock of alarm and excitement, her emotions were of a more conflicting nature than she had ever before experienced. She had suffered more than she would have liked to confess, even to herself, from the discovery of Mr. Bligh's disingenuousness, only then ascertaining how far she had allowed her affections to go; still, time and absence, and her pride and resolution, had enabled her to so far conquer her feelings that she would have imagined herself cured—but for what followed, which presently undeceived her. It was impossible to forget that, whatever had been his shortcomings towards herself and others, they had their origin in a passion for her, which, however alloyed with vanity and selfishness, was unquestionably sincere; inasmuch as he adhered to it in the face of his father's anger and the apparent hopelessness of ever bringing it to a successful issue. That fact, which even his uncle corroborated—admitting, too, that he thought his nephew might prove as obstinate as his brother—could not but make a powerful impression upon the mind of Ruth. He had but to give up what seemed entirely out of his reach, to effect a parental reconciliation and rescue himself from poverty and comparative social outlawry; yet he preferred both to such a surrender. Surely there was something heroic, something disinterested in this, which might atone for the past—for she naturally ignored the suspicion that it originated as much in obstinacy as affection. Again, they could not say that he had ever pretended to like his cousin—Mr. Samuel Bligh allowed that; it was one of those heartless family matches which he had never sufficiently considered or repelled, until—&c. In short, the girl's heart was engaged in special pleading against her judgment; and we know which is most potent in young ladies of seventeen. She had secretly forgiven him before his return, though without any hope of it; and it could not fail to produce a revival of old tenderness. Then a conspiracy of circumstances seemed to place his fate in her hands, and even to array those friends who had been most influential with her on his side. If the ladies, if the Squire, thought him worthy of pardon and patronage, was it for her to controvert their judgment as well as her own private inclinations? And here her imagination conjured up a similar but more seductive picture of the future to that which had presented itself to the minds of the ancient spinsters. In fine, the girl came to just the conclusion that might have been expected; and aware that her guardian's decision would be subservient to that of his patron, resolved herself to interpose no permanent objections to a reconciliation.

She also determined, supplementarily, to leave all the advances to the other side and to behave with great circumspection, thereby quieting any latent misgivings she may have entertained; and, like a good many persons, finding a sort of justification for an act of questionable expediency by setting about the preliminaries very carefully. Accordingly she did not appear at church on the day upon which Mr. Bligh officiated, delegating her place at the harmonium to the school-mistress, and thereby disappointing the gossips of the village of an eagerly-anticipated opportunity for observation and scandal. All of which precautions, of course, only delayed an inevitable conclusion; for, further assisted by what we call accident, the young clergyman speedily made his peace and took up his residence indefinitely at Thorpe Parva.

THE JAPANESE AMBASSADORS IN EUROPE, AND THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

It appears from our special despatch from Europe, published to-day, that the Japanese Ambassadors had returned from St. Petersburg to Berlin, and at this latter city had a lengthy conference with an eminent German professor of jurisprudence as to the propriety of endeavoring to establish Christianity as the State religion of Japan. These Ambassadors have seen how far Christian Europe is advanced in civilization over other parts of the world, and reasoned, no doubt, that their own country would make greater progress if Christianity were made the religion of the State. Such reasoning is natural. But the German professor dissuaded them from entertaining such a project. He argued from facts in the history of Christendom, to show that this religion cannot be enforced by government; that it is only vital when it grows up among and from a people, and that it should be encouraged rather than enforced. As a consequence he advised the Japanese to grant full religious liberty. The Ambassadors seemed to regard the change of religion in Japan as probable. They listened, however, with great interest to the arguments of the professor and expressed satisfaction for the advice he had given. What a curious fact in our nineteenth century civilization is this! One of the oldest nations on the globe actually contemplating discarding its paganism of thousands of years' standing and adopting the Christian religion! Hardly less curious is the advice of a great thinker of Christian Europe, not to attempt to force this religion upon the people. How broadly liberal the world is becoming! It is not long since Christian nations deemed it a duty to force their religion, and by fire and sword, if necessary, upon unbelievers. Japan appears to be making rapid progress in Western civilization, and no doubt the liberal and philosophical views expressed by the German professor will have a good influence upon the people and government of that country.—*N. George MacDonald preached in Robert Laird Collier's church in Chicago, April 13, and closed his sermon by saying: "I believe in nothing but the Lord revealed in Christ." We cannot refrain from saying that we pity the poverty of Mr. MacDonald's belief. It is inexpressibly sad to see so glorious a mind confined in so petty a creed.

One who heard Rev. Mr. Murray, of the Boston Park Street Church, lecture, reports him as saying that "out of twenty evangelical clergymen, not three are true to their convictions." We hope Mr. Murray is mistaken in his judgment of his ministerial brethren. We would far rather every one of them should be Orthodox to the last degree, than liberal after such a cowardly and insincere fashion.

Henry Ward Beecher told the Yale divinity students that "any one who can repeat the Lord's Prayer has a right to call himself a Christian." We are very much obliged to Christians for trying to be so liberal towards heretics. We suppose they mean well enough; but we confess we should respect them more if they would adhere with all logical consistency to their Christian profession, or utterly depart from it.

The Chicago Post understands that "President Eliot, of Harvard College, denies the report that all the religious observances at that institution are to be abolished or made voluntary." What is a "religious observance" according to the magnates of Harvard College? It is to compel a student to listen, at a most unseasonable hour on a cold winter's morning, to a very long prayer, while he is all the time inwardly swearing at the stupidity of those who instituted, and those who perpetuate, such an irrational custom.

The Christian Recorder says: "No question is receiving so much serious thought as the question, Is Christianity gaining or losing?" This is indeed the question that confronts us, and our Christian friends do well to give it "serious thought." But so far as Christianity is true, it is not losing, and never will be. Let us seek truth, whether Christian or otherwise. The truth never loses; it is always gaining. There is one degree of infidelity to which we can never descend; and that is fear of or fear for the truth.

A correspondent of the Terre Haute Gazette represents a certain Rev. Mr. Howe, of Terre Haute, as discoursing upon the question: "Can criminals be sent straight to heaven?" Of course they can; how can any Christian doubt it? Is not "the blood of Christ" sufficient for their case? "There is a fountain filled," you know, with this blood, and sinners immersed in that sanguinary element "lose all their guilty stains." Why hesitate to believe it? "Just as I am, without one plea, but that thy blood was shed for me, O Lamb of God, I come!" That is what the criminal may say, and say truly; and he may "come," or he may go, as straightly from the gallows to heaven, as from any other place. Logic is logic; and we are glad to know that Rev. Mr. Howe believes that it is, for he decided finally to answer his question in the affirmative, saying: "Character, we humbly submit, is not so much to be depended upon as the mercy of the Lord!"

We refer our readers to Mr. Abbot's article in this number of THE INDEX, headed "Dollar Donations." We trust it will be read with hearty sympathy and meet with a generous response. Now especially is the time for the friends of THE INDEX to show their friendship in the most helpful and practical manner.

Last week and this week our editorial pages have contained no other contributions than those from our own pen and that of Mr. Abbot. This week the Annual Meeting of the stockholders has considerably interrupted and prevented our editorial labors, and the last INDEX which as Acting Editor we have to offer to our readers must be received by them with indulgence.

James Freeman Clarke, in his review of O. B. Frothingham's Religion of Humanity, made great claims for Unitarianism as compared with Free Religion, as to the immense service it has rendered in liberalizing the Orthodox thought and sentiment of this country, and altogether came very near intimating that wisdom would die with the Unitarian apostles. Mr. Clarke seems to be thoroughly astonished that anybody can desire anything more liberal than Unitarianism, and is not at all disposed to admit that anything more liberal can be found than "Liberal Christianity." We are not in the least disposed to underrate the great liberalizing services of Unitarianism, for the memory of it is very venerable and sacred to us. We once thought it was the end of the road of liberalism, and the custodian of the very highest interests of truth; therefore we can pardon a little of this vanity in others now. But there is a tide in the affairs of thought, which Unitarianism was only an indication of. It went with that tide for a time, and was a true guide pointing towards liberty and light; but it lost the courage to take that tide at its flood, and so was not led on to the fortune of continuing to be its true index. That tide still flows, and Unitarianism and "Liberal Christianity" are being left by it very near the shore. A Baptist organ, the Morning Star, is wiser than Mr. Clarke, and sees what he does not see. Alluding to Mr. Clarke's assumption that Unitarianism is the Alpha and Omega of liberalism in this country, it says:—

"But this claim is hardly less than preposterous. Neither wisdom, nor progressive thought, nor theological liberality was born with the Unitarian ministers and laymen; these things do not wholly hang upon the thread which now supports the lives of this school of thinkers; and when they die we fancy that God will somehow order things so that the religious world shall not go into perpetual eclipse, and will save our theology and ecclesiasticism from being cast in bronze or crystallized into granite. The fact is, these great tides of modern thought represent forces far higher and mightier than those inhering in the Unitarian body."

ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

Towards the close of May, annually, about all the Societies in Massachusetts, useful and useless, send delegates to Boston, to hold meetings, ventilate their eloquence, and devise ways and means for future effort. This old-fashioned system, whose origin goeth beyond the memory, perhaps, of this generation or the one preceding, "came off" last week; and Orthodoxy and heterodoxy, social and labor reform, Spiritualism and Free Religion, etc., etc., et hoc genus omne (and everything of the sort), were represented. If any of them did anything good for this world, we are glad of it. Another world we have no interest in—until we get there.

We looked in awhile at the Free Religion Convention held at the Tremont Temple on Friday afternoon, but there was not much of an audience, and the speaking was dull and tame. John Weiss was holding forth, and we judged from what he said that, if the end and aim of Free Religion, as he understands it, is to mystify and befog the whole subject, Mr. Weiss is very well qualified for that religious or unprofitable work. Col. Higginson, and Messrs. Frothingham, Abbot, Morse, and Robert Dale Owen, of that party, are rather more practical and understandable; but even with them there is considerable room for improvement before they attain to an unaffected, clear, and intelligible style of talking.—Boston Investigator.

What is unintelligible to some, quite often is very intelligible to others. The sympathetic and appreciative hearer not infrequently renders the speaker both intelligible and inspiring.

THE FINAL ISSUE.

The stockholders of the Index Association held their second annual meeting in the office of THE INDEX last Saturday, June 7. The only result of that meeting which I wish here to announce is the restoration of Francis E. Abbot to the editorship of THE INDEX, with complete control over both its editorial and business departments. In retiring, as I now do, from the position which I have held for the last three months as Acting Editor of this paper, I rejoice to know that Mr. Abbot is to resume his place as its editor. To him, as to no other man, this paper belongs. He made it, in a sense that no one else has; and no other man could hope to remake it or continue it with the same mastery of hand. Among all its friends, none now exults with a more hearty satisfaction that he is again to conduct and control THE INDEX, than myself; nor will any one hope more earnestly than I do that the time may be long before it will again pass from his guiding and shaping influence.

Perhaps it is hardly necessary for me to say that the position which I was suddenly called to fill as Acting Editor has, under the circumstances, been a most difficult and delicate one. I found myself at once confronting enraged because half-baffled foes, and others who, as enthusiastic friends of the retiring editor, could hardly regard with patience any one who stood, however unwillingly, for a time in the place so rightfully his. In addition to this, the editorial corps of the paper was sadly broken up as the result of the action of the Directors in their meeting of March 13. Our foreign contributors ceased to write after the first of April, and nearly all our editorial associates in this country almost immediately discontinued their contributions; while the literary department, mainly in the hands of Messrs. Vickers and Towne, had to be abandoned. All this of course, taken in connection with the immediately necessary reduction of the paper to its former size, produced a change in the character of THE INDEX which was sudden and marked, and which could not but be by comparison very unfavorable to the new editor. However, all that I can say is that in my trying and arduous position I have done the best I could; and for whatever has been well done, and whatever ill, I ask no praise and shrink from no criticism.

As between the two parties and the two sides in the unfortunate controversy which has grown out of "THE INDEX troubles," I have as editor acted as impartially and justly as perhaps one could whose heart and judgment thoroughly approved one cause and disapproved the other. I sincerely hope that these troubles have been effectually terminated now, and that both sides will gracefully and magnanimously accept the issue,—the victors bearing their victory meekly, and the defeated their defeat wisely. Above all things I trust that THE INDEX, and the cause as served by it, will be saved from all harm by what has transpired, and will be carried forward to great and greater triumph. Let every true friend of both dedicate himself and herself anew to their service with deeper consecration; and henceforth may the only strife be who shall make the best and most self-sacrificing contribution. My soul loves peace and hates contention. Peace let us have; but purity first and foremost.

To all who have given to me their encouragement and help I tender my warmest thanks. The Directors have appointed me Associate Editor of THE INDEX, and in that capacity I shall hope to continue to serve it.

A. W. STEVENS.

Rev. John C. Kimball (Unitarian) preached not long since, before the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, on the question, "Does it pay to be good?" We hope that Mr. Kimball gets all the "pay" he wants for being good; but as for ourself, miserable sinner that we are, we confess that, when we do succeed now and then in being good, we like it so well that we neither ask nor think of any other "pay" than the "good" itself. But we suppose we ought to want all heaven besides; yet we don't. What is to become of us?

DOLLAR DONATIONS.

Reserving for next week all mention of the stockholders' meeting of the Index Association, the general result of which is announced in the editorial leader of Mr. Stevens, I trust I shall be pardoned for making now a frank appeal to the generosity of my friends on the very prosaic subject of dollars and cents. During this summer the receipts of the paper will fall below its expenses, unless those who are interested in its final success shall now seize the favorable moment for securing this beyond reasonable doubt. There will be no need of anticipating the autumn's receipts at all, if a little concerted action is taken promptly; and, although the regular dues of the subscription and stock list between now and then will be sufficient, if punctually paid, more than to cover the absolutely inevitable demands for money, the recent troubles have entailed a direct loss of uncertain amount which will seriously embarrass me in my efforts to sustain the high character of the paper. I hope to be enabled to re-engage some, at least, of the contributors whose writings are so seriously missed in these columns, and in other ways to make THE INDEX what it ought to be; but nothing involving expense will be attempted unless the means are fully provided beforehand.

Hoping and believing, therefore, that the constituency of THE INDEX are earnestly desirous of helping me in these efforts to create a journal worthy of the best cause of the age, I beg every subscriber to the paper, on reading these words, to send me at once a donation of ONE DOLLAR, to be credited to a special DOLLAR DONATION FUND, and to be appropriated at my own discretion to the most urgent wants of the paper. I promise in return to devote the money thus entrusted to me, first to supplying any deficiency in meeting current expenses, and secondly to such other purposes as shall seem most wise and judicious in building up the paper. Every cent shall be expended economically and according to the best judgment I possess.

I venture to make this request for dollar donations as a personal favor, but not for any personal use; and the use made of it shall be fully reported to the Directors. All donations thus made will be specially acknowledged in these columns.

If anybody is possessed with an irresistible desire to send more than one dollar, it is a desire which partaketh not of the nature of sin, and may be virtuously indulged.

F. E. ARNOT.

Among his other exploits, P. T. Barnum has captured Zion's Herald. He did it while he was "exhibiting" in Boston. That Methodist organ performed praise for him in its editorial columns. It seems that Mr. Barnum (with an eye to business of course) has "Scriptural pictures and sentiments" emblazoned on the paraphernalia of his great show, and with equal characteristic shrewdness he gives free passes to "ministers of the gospel." Thus was the Herald seduced! Thus was it persuaded to write up Mr. Barnum's circus, and say that it was "relieved from all objectionable qualities, in the estimation of the moral part of the Boston community." Could THE INDEX secure the Herald's support, if we were to put a "Scriptural sentiment" at the head of our editorial columns, and send our paper free to ministers?

Mr. John Fiske, of Harvard college, has written a note to the Christian Union, in which he deuces that he is a Positivist. He says very distinctly: "If twelve years' study of the Positive philosophy has taught me anything, it has taught me that it is utterly impossible, save by the entire distortion and misuse of language, to classify me as a Positivist. I differ fundamentally and in toto from the Positive school, whether represented by Comte himself, or by Littré, or by Mill, or by the adherents of the so-called 'Religion of Humanity.'"—Liberal Christian.

The New York Methodist Preachers' Association, at a recent meeting, requested reporters and others not to furnish any report of the proceedings to either the secular or religious press. And one minister, objecting to a report in which he was called "Brother," said "he wanted no servant of the devil to call him brother."—Chicago Post.

MY FIRST PREACHING.

I was buttoning up my boots, my mother was preparing a lunch for me at the table, the men-folks were standing around, as men-folks will in winter, in the country, talking, yawning, eating apples, and getting rested after their fashion for the next summer's farm-work. My Christmas vacation was up, and in half an hour I was going to start for Boston,—the start to consist in a five-mile sleigh-ride to the depot of a small village. I was not thinking at all about the ministry. I had never entertained the remotest idea that I should be called to preach; least of all did I expect such a summons to be made to me in open daylight, on a cold winter's morning, in our kitchen. I had always supposed these "calls" came in the deep and solemn hours of the night, in some mysterious and unearthly manner that ministers could reveal, but nobody else ever have.

A neighbor knocked at the door, entered, and said that "Old Josiah" was dead, and he wanted my brother to go and help "lay him out." Just then another neighbor knocked, entered, and also said that "Old Josiah" was dead. "Then the old man is gone," said my father; and his face was full of pity. "Yes," said neighbor number one, "he is dead, and out of his misery, I hope." Besides knowing "Old Josiah" all my life, I had been hearing especially about him every day for a week,—that he had tried to cut his throat; that he could not speak; that he was always at the window with the most haggard looks; that he would write on his slate, "I am dying," and hold it up for the passers-by to read; that some were frightened at his tragical appearance; that others suspected him of trickery, and still others said that the town furnished him with too much opium and laudanum. So I was prepared to hear all this said over by our two neighbors, and a great many more peculiar things concerning the decease of "Old Josiah," which conversation grew rather violent and angry for so serious a topic. One blamed him for dying; the other blamed the neighbors for letting him die for want of charity. One thought he had gone to hell; the other did not know where he had gone, but was of the opinion he ought to have as good a place as some other folks. I was listening attentively, and thinking all the time; when suddenly I received a tremendous "call" to speak right out, then and there. I hesitated a moment, for I feared my sermon would be a radical one; and my audience, I knew, was strictly Orthodox, and one of them a Baptist deacon at that. I never felt sure that I belonged to the persuasion known as "radical," only that I had been in the habit of extracting religion from Nature and human nature, after my own idea of things, and fashioning my own creed to suit my individual needs. And this I knew my Orthodox friends were not in the habit of doing; for their creed is always kept carefully laid up in their little white church in our neighborhood, and only taken down on baptismal days, when it is read over by the minister before admitting people to the church. But the ignorance of these two men, and the sorrow of my old father who did not know what he was sorrowing after, got the better of my timidity; and my "call" was so imperative to let the light shine that was within me, that I could not resist. And so I started for the window—where light and coolness were—with one boot on and one off, and my boot-buttoner firmly grasped in my hand.

I began by asking my audience to look out upon two trees,—one a tall, graceful, perfectly shaped ash that stands by the brook, near the house; the other a gnarled, crooked, twisted old apple-tree that grows on a knoll in the back yard. I said: "One of these trees—the ash—began its growth in good soil; has been nourished in good soil all its life; has never disobeyed one of Nature's laws for growing a perfect ash-tree. You see it going right up towards heaven, as beautiful, peaceful, and happy a tree as one would care to look upon. But the apple-tree was planted in poor soil, where we used to throw too much ashes and old rubbish; it has had too much hot soap-suds from wash tubs; clothes-lines have been tied to it, and swings have bent its branches, and whips have been cut from it for children to play with, and scythes have been hung on it, cutting its bark, and creatures have gnawed it; and now it is a tired old apple-tree tending earthwards—a sad failure. 'Old Josiah' started just as this tree did—in bad soil. He was born bad, of two elements called father and mother, that much resemble salaratus and cider, which uniting in the child produced a foam that has effervesced in our neighborhood ever since I can remember, and long before. To-day, for the first time since this strange nature has had life, God has hushed it into quiet. Let us be thankful that it is still. When I was a little girl, and we all used to go to revival meetings, 'Old Josiah' was sure to be there; and how many times we have heard him talk and pray till he was hoarse, and our ears were fairly crazed. Then you know he would stop on the way home, at the neighbors' houses, and exhort till midnight, and reaching home would scream and pray till morning. The next day he would very likely kick his wife and children out of doors, and then resort to opium to subdue his excited nerves and overcome them with sleep. This religious excitement he has followed up all his days, and it has done for his nature just what the hot soap-suds and various cuts and hacks have done for the tree—turned it farther and farther from the track of God's laws. The Bible has been a book for him to dispute about with everybody, and get mad and go crazy over. Both the Church and the Bible have been a curse to him, when they should have been a blessing. It is the business of the Church to make good soil for men to grow in, physically and mentally and morally; it should administer the Bible in moderate doses—not too much soap-suds for the tree; not too much Bible for man. It should discover how men ought to be born, and what should be the remedy if they are born badly; what should be done for the body as well as the soul, and the intellect as well as either. It should learn how to cultivate about the roots of a man's soul, so that he may grow from within, and be a help to himself at home and away from prayer-meetings, on his farm and away from meeting-houses. It should be a wise school, teaching man how to grow like a perfect tree, hedged in all the way by Nature's laws, going hand in hand with a system of perfect development. 'Old Josiah' is dead, and what is left of him (God has taken and will re-plant in better soil. The old tree is a failure, but it has borne fruit which very likely will yet glorify the face of Nature with perfectly formed trees; his soul will reach a natural and happy condition, and become harmonized and shaped into a beautiful form that will some day surprise you and me. Don't contend longer about his past or future, but turn from him to the living present, and see to it that no more such distorted and unnatural deaths occur in this community. You have men alive in your midst as insane about the Church and the Bible as he was, going from one to the other to get relief, and finding only added torment in either."

I have forgotten the rest of my discourse, but we all sat down and talked over the other characters in our neighborhood, that seem to be like "Old Josiah," and considered what could be done for them. I stayed till I lost my train, and had to travel all night on account of my lengthy preaching.

LOUISE S. HOTCHKISS.

BOSTON, January 12, 1873.

"COME TO JESUS."

It is the common appeal of our high-pressure revival preachers, from Charles Finney and Elder Knapp down to Brother Earle and Dr. Fulton (to hurry up their converts and lead them to make a rush for the kingdom of heaven), that there are many who "seek to enter in" but, because they do not "strive" with sufficient earnestness, they are not "able"—they are behind time; the door of mercy closes and leaves them outside. And so it happens that every revival becomes a sort of "scrub" race-course, and the feeling prevails among the young people, and is diligently fostered by the evangelists, that they must look out for themselves, and make good time in coming to Jesus; or, like the foolish virgins in the parable, they will come out "nowhere" but in hell,—for the Devil, according to the old proverb, "takes the hindmost." "Come to Jesus just now" is the evangelical refrain—"to-morrow you may die, or the spirit of God may leave you joined to your idols;" and then it will be "everlastingly too late."

An excellent illustration of this shrewd little spurring-up operation on the part of our revival-mongers is found in the way the ducks are brought home at night in a hurry on the Hoogly river. E. E. Hale thus describes it in Mr. Beecher's paper, the Christian Union:—

"The duck-breeders keep the ducks in large boats, and there they sell them. But every morning they send them out to swim and pick up their daily bread as they can. How get them home again? Why, rice and other provender is served out at the proper time, and some signal is made which the ducks hear. Then the last duck who returns is seized and beaten horribly! The consequence is that the poor ducks hurry with crazy speed that they may not be the last."

But the confusion, the quackery, the inter-pocine struggle, and I fear the mutual hatred engendered among the last sixth part of the ducks, are terrible to remember, terrible to reflect upon."

So to reflecting minds, the indecorous confusion, the grossness and quackery of this revival measure are awful to witness. God is represented as more cruel by far than the duck-breeders, in that he absolutely kills and tortures the "hindmost" souls. And so it comes to pass singular as it may seem, that a barbarous process of terror and fright and punishment dire, which is allowed among the semi-savages on the Hoogly river, but which, if practised here or in any decent civilized land, would make the duck-breeder liable to instant arrest by the officers of the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," is made the model of our American revival-system, under which our children and our neighbors' children go, at the peculiar call of the sensation preachers, to get their religious pabulum.

Archbishop Whately, in one of his admirable essays, calls attention to the fact that, such is the blinding effect of custom and habit, many Christians are in the daily indulgence of practices which they never perhaps dream to be wrong, and yet which, if they had heard of for the first time as those of some savages and pagan people, would have been classed without hesitation as among the horrible results of their heathenism and barbarism. The above revival-measure is a good case in point. Years ago we were told of the car of Juggernaut, which ran over and crushed to death numbers of its East Indian devotees, who recklessly or slothfully suffered themselves to be in its path as it thundered along the highway at the time of the great religious festival. And we shuddered as we thought of the depths of ignorance and debasement which would foster the idea that such sacrifices were well-pleasing to God, and that it was a real divine service which was rendered in dragging the ponderous car with rushing enthusiasm over the mangled bodies of the victims. And shall we not shudder as we see these peripatetic revivalists rushing through the country in the pretended interest of Christianity, and representing that the laggard ones, and all who do not move swiftly in propelling the car of their man-God, will be inevitably crushed beneath its remorseless wheels? Is the wrath of Juggernaut to be denounced, and "the wrath of the Lamb" commended? Shall we compassionate the ducks of the Hoogly river, and have no pity for our American youth subjected to a similar but infinitely worse system of terrorism and abuses?

THE BATTLE BEGUN.

The writer of a satirical article in No. 169 of THE INDEX concludes a seeming defence of the religious veto-power of a certain Christian body, as exercised against a prominent lecturer, with the following subtle conclusion: "He was mightily helped by it!"

He intimates that this organized body of sectarists might, if they chose, banish from their immaculate halls such persons as Froude, Mrs. Siddons, Mark Twain, Bret Harte, and John Hay, provided the taint of radicalism were to be found in their historical, dramatic, or recitative performances, such as is expected to stain everything that proceeds from the mouth of one of the apostles of heresy, even to a "criticism" into which he occasionally lapses as a scholarly diversion.

The person the writer refers to is none other than the eloquent John Weiss, who was recently refused the use of a certain hall in New York for the delivery of his lectures on Shakespeare. The reason for this denial on the part of the custodians of said hall was that the "heretical" sentiments of the speaker appear in all his public addresses, even in the handling of the old-fashioned theme of the Poet of Humanity. This exclusion of John Weiss—the most witty, resolute, and outspoken of the New England radicals—has called forth indignant comments, and both the secular and religious press charge this unfortunate body with bigotry.

The signing of a "protest" for the suppression of one weekly paper is only a little whiff of the great storm that will threaten every act, public or private, which openly or covertly embodies opposition to the priesthood; and not the Church alone, but society, comes under its special dictation, its various grades of preference being nothing more nor less than the state of their Christian "graces." Yet this Christian body must allow that the foundations of Christianity have been sorely shaken. While it still holds the key of patronage, commands influence and position, it is flourishing in the branches, but dying at the root. And their excessive use of power is one evidence of the strength they have to encounter; neither ritual nor creed, nor any of the "jack o' lantern" scares that used to keep reason from rising, have now the least potency to crush free thought and free speech, but rather, as the satirical writer says, "helps it mightily in the end."

Mr. Frothingham clearly discerns that not only this preventing of John Weiss, but every exercise of their veto-power, only helps the cause they assail. If one thing more than another broadens and deepens the growth of ideas, it is persecution. The stake and the Inquisition made Protestantism leap out of its swaddling-clothes into the stature of a giant. The abuse of power reacts terribly on the individual or body of persons thus outraging justice. If the time has arrived—and we think it has—for it to culminate in the Y. M. C. A., the nineteenth century may as well see the era of a new birth for freedom as the twentieth. The actual striking off of the fetters from the victims of the slave-power in the South was but the undoing of the most palpable and crude form of slavery; what is yet to come is the emancipation of MIND from the bias of prejudice, and the abolition, not only of the one-man-power throughout the entire earth, but the bodies and sects of Christians (or Pagans) who seek for arbitrary rule over the rights of individuals. And these outward vigorous manifestations of the power of Christianity do not discourage our faith in the final triumph of truth which will yet bless the world, when that great sect shall be stripped of all the meanness, hatred, and malice which now bring so much dishonor to it.

THE "COST SYSTEM" AGAIN.

BOSTON, June 1, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In Mr. E. L. Crane's attempt at a reply, in INDEX No. 178, to my communication in advocacy of the cost-principle, he makes a few arguments which probably seem to him eminently practical, and to most people (especially those who have not examined the subject) eminently plausible; but which, it seems to me, will not bear the test of close examination. In the first place, I deny that I "laid it down as a fundamental principle that 'cost must govern price.'" On the contrary, I deduced it by a strictly logical process from a proposition which political economists pronounce self-evident; and his illustrations fail to show any fallacy in the argument.

Mr. Crane complains that he can get but one dollar and fifty cents per bushel for wheat which costs him three dollars. Now what is the cause of this? Evidently some of his neighbors are able to raise wheat at the cost of one dollar and fifty cents per bushel; which only serves to show that Mr. Crane has chosen the wrong profession, and should leave it for another where his brains, talents, and opportunities will enable him to compete favorably with his fellow-craftsmen. If this is not the reason, then Mr. Crane's neighbors are also losing one dollar and fifty cents per bushel, which would suggest this query: How long can either he or they do business before going into bankruptcy? When Mr. Crane proves himself competent to outdo or even equal his fellow-workmen in the production of wheat, I will gladly favor him with my patronage and pay him the full cost price. Until then I prefer to purchase of those who are able to raise an equally good article at a less cost.

Mr. Crane says (speaking ironically) that his neighbor who commenced farming forty years ago has charged more than cost for his grain, and is plainly a thief. There's many a true word spoken in jest. But he has not stolen from Mr. Crane, for he has had no transactions with him. It is the purchasers of the wheat who have been cheated; and to them rightfully belongs the money which Mr. Crane's neighbor has filched from them in the form of profit. Although the phrase "unconscious thief" may be etymologically the contradiction in terms which Mr. Crane supposes it to be, nevertheless, according to common usage—which Guizot says should always be our criterion—it is nothing of the kind. Otherwise, why do we so often see and hear the expressions "conscious" and "unconscious guilt"?

In the "case" which Mr. Crane supposes, I should say that the two men who used their money in making profits at farming were equally guilty with the man who loaned his money at interest. Neither can be defended. Under an equitable system the larger yield attendant upon improvements in the land would be worth no more to the producer for purposes of exchange (save the compensation for the cost of improvement), than the smaller yield which resulted from the same amount of labor. The tree of logic still remains erect, notwithstanding Mr. Crane's attempts to chop it down. I am afraid that he will have to take his axe in hand once more.

Yours truly,
BENJ. R. TUCKER.

CRUELTY AS A PASTIME.

"Cruelty in low places is disgusting enough, but cruelty in high places—cruelty committed by ladies and gentlemen with calm deliberation in the midst of beautiful gardens, and enlivened by the gay chatter of well-bred society—is doubly revolting. This is what the English Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals thinks about pigeon-shooting, and it asks the London pigeon-club if wanton cruelty to the most innocent and defenceless of dumb creatures be the fashionable amusement of the day, must there not be something faulty in our national life—something rotten? Mr. Bergh, sometime ago, made a similar appeal to American sportsmen (if shooting pigeons from a trap can be called sport), and there is no doubt but what his action led the sister society in London to "go and do ikewise." We trust the effort of both societies will be, as they should be, successful. Pigeon shooting should be put down and forbidden upon the same ground that dog fights and cock fighting are. It is a cruel sport, and the press can do a great deal to stop it by denouncing and crying shame upon it."

The above article was penned by the Rev. Mr. Knowles, editor of the Home Journal published in Madison, Ga. He is an Episcopal clergyman, and evinces a humane and benevolent feeling in condemning cruelty, even in a refined form. Now if this good man will examine his miserable theology, he will find he makes his God to be more cruel than any pigeon-shooter on the continent. He deliberately teaches that the God of the Bible, for the simple offence of "unbelief" (Mark xvi. 16), will damn human beings—our brothers and sisters—to all eternity, and punish them in "hell-fire," roasting them "like a her-ring," without any compassion. This cruel doctrine is taught from the pulpit, and is called the "gospel." If a man wantonly shoots a pigeon, it is called cruelty. But God can torment his helpless children without end, and it is called justice. When will people have as good sense and discernment about what they call divine things as they already have about human conduct? The clergy seem to delight in holding up their God as a "consuming fire."

PROF. RANKE AND FREE RELIGION.

Mr. Dall, in his book, From Calcutta to London (p. 148), speaks of meeting at Dresden and spending "a delightful hour" with Prof. Ranke, so widely known by his History of the Popes. Says Mr. Dall:—

"He is a most winsome man of seventy-five. His interest in the world's progress and awakening is that of a youth of twenty. . . . He rejoiced in the Free Religious movement in the United States, affiliating all who love God and man,—Christians, Hebrews, Brahmans, and all. The Brahmo movement in India specially touched him," and so forth.

ARISTOTLE SUPERIOR TO MODERN NATURALISTS.—In some ways the study of natural history has lost rather than gained in modern civilization. You would be surprised to learn how well-informed the Greeks were, for instance, about the structure of animals. All college students know that the ancients delighted in critical analysis of intellectual problems, as well as in dramatic and poetical composition, and in all beauty of sculpture and architecture. But I think their familiarity with Nature is not so well known as their culture in letters and art. Aristotle knew more of certain kinds of animals and their general relations than is known now. For instance, he never confounded sharks and skates with ordinary fishes, while modern naturalists would put them in one and the same class. Strange to say, I have studied the Selacians on the South American coast by the light of Aristotle's researches upon them in the Mediterranean Sea, made by him more than two thousand years ago. I can fairly add that the knowledge of Aristotle on these topics is so far ahead of the current information recorded in modern works of natural history that his statements can only be understood by one who has made a special study of those animals. The community evidently shared his knowledge, for he refers to text-books of natural history which must, from the details he gives about them, have been superior to those we have now. You may seek in vain in the anatomical atlases of Wagner or Carus for information about the structure of the reproductive apparatus of Selacians, to which Aristotle alludes as contained in the text-books of anatomists and belonging to the current knowledge of the time.—Prof. Agassiz, Harvard Lecture.

It shocks us to think that from Italy, the land of art and taste, could come to us the ghastly news that some showman has embalmed or petrified the body of Mazzini, and is exhibiting the old hero to a curious public at a price per capita! If Barnum had done this thing, we would not be so startled and stunned, because the Mermald and the Woolly-horse have served as pre-existent mitigations of such a surprise. But the countrymen of Michael Angelo, who bade him to carve Moses for an immortal statue, are the same people who encourage an undertaker to petrify Mazzini and exhibit him as a mummy!—Golden Age.

"Who built the water-works at Jerusalem?" was the subject considered at a Fitchburg Sunday school on a recent Sabbath; and somebody proposed for the next week, "What salary did they pay the commissioners?"—St. Louis Globe.

A minister having remarked "there would be a nave in the new edifice the society was erecting," an old lady said "she knew the person to whom he referred."

THE FATE OF THE EARTH.

That very large portion of the unscientific public which is interested in questions relating to the "future of the earth," will do well to look at No. 7 of "Half-hour Recreations in Popular Science," published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston. The number in question is a paper by Prof. A. Winchell, of the University of Michigan, on the "Geology of the Stars," in which he gives a summary of the present condition of scientific knowledge with regard to the history of matter, from its nebulous to its stellar, and, finally, its planetary condition. On the probable future of the earth the first two phases throw no light, but the last does. There is in the moon, as every one knows, no present evidence of the existence of an atmosphere or of water; but their "former existence is a fair and direct deduction from the doctrine of the common origin of the earth and moon." But if they once existed how shall we explain their disappearance? They have been absorbed by the rocks. In an age long gone by, the moon was in the same physical condition as the earth. The water on its surface, or that which descended in periodic storms, as it percolated the porous rocks and thin crust of the moon, soon reached a temperature which dissipated it in vapor, and returned it to the surface to be recondensed. But the moon, having only one-fourth the bulk of the earth, cooled forty-nine times as rapidly as the earth, and at length a temperature was reached at which the rocks on the surface took it in faster than it could be evaporated again. "The moon is a fossil world, an ancient cinder suspended in the heavens, once the seat of all the varied and intense activities which now characterize the surface of our earth, but in the present period a realm of silence and stagnation."

Such will be the fate of the earth. Already our planet has passed through the "ring condition" now presented by Saturn, and the stage now seen in Jupiter, in which "a water-mist begins to condense in the peripheral regions," and gathers with a vaporous envelope; this precipitates an aqueous rain, which ultimately finds a resting-place upon the incrustated nucleus. Later, life makes its appearance. Then comes the terrestrial stage, in which we now are, and in which the "organic phase culminates." Then comes the stage in which Mars now seems to be, with diminished vapors and infrequent rains, encroaching cold, and "decline of the organic phase." Last of all will be the stage in which the moon now is, beginning with the disappearance of aqueous vapors, ending with the total absorption of ocean and air, the extinction of organization, and final refrigeration.

"The progressive cooling of the earth will allow the waters to circulate deeper and deeper. When the thickness of the terrestrial shell, which must be saturated with water, has doubled, the increased demand must lower the waters of the ocean, and long before refrigeration has reached the centre the thirsty rocks will have swallowed the sea and all our surface waters. The drained, and shrunken, and shivered zone lying nearer the surface will suck in the atmosphere, and this will disappear in the pores and the caverns of the worn-out world."—The Nation.

CHILDREN.

If I were to choose among all gifts and qualities that which on the whole makes life pleasantest, I should select the love of children. No circumstance can render this world wholly a solitude to one who has this possession. It is a freemasonry. Wherever one goes, there are the little brethren and sisters of the mystic tie. No diversity of race or tongue makes much difference. A smile speaks the universal language. "If I value myself on anything," said the lonely Hawthorne, "it is on having a smile that children love." They are such prompt little beings, too; they require so little prelude. Hearts are won in two minutes at that frank period, and so long as you are true to them they will be true to you. They use no argument, no bribery. They have a hearty appetite for gifts, no doubt, but it is not for these that they love the giver. Take the wealth of the world and lavish it with counterfeit affection: I will win all the children's hearts away from you by empty-handed love. The gorgeous toys will dazzle them for an hour; then their instincts will revert to their natural friends. In visiting a house where there are children, I do not like to take them presents; it is better to forego the pleasure of the giving than to divide the welcome between yourself and the gift. Let that follow after you are gone.

To love children is to love childhood, instinctively, at whatever distance; the first impulse being one of attraction, though it may be checked by later discoveries. Unless your heart commands at least as long a range as your eye, it is not worth much. The dearest saint in my calendar never entered a railway car that she did not look round for a baby, which, when discovered, must always be won at once into her arms. If it was dirty, she would have been glad to bathe it; if ill, to heal it: it would not have seemed to her anything worthy the name of love, to seek only those who were wholesome and clean.

When I think of the self-devotion which the human heart can contain—of those saintly souls that are in love with sorrow, and that yearn to shelter all weakness and all grief—it inspires an unspeakable confidence that there must also be an instinct of parentage beyond this human race, a heart of hearts, cor cordium. As we all crave something to protect, so we long to feel ourselves protected. We are all infants before the Infinite; and as I turned from that cottage window to the resplendent sky, it was easy to fancy that mute embrace, that shadowy symbol of affection, expanding from the narrow lattice till it touched the stars, gathering every created soul into the arms of immortal Love.—T. W. Higginson.

THE GARROTE IN SPAIN.—They put people to death in Spain in very odd fashion. From an account of a recent execution in Madrid, we learn that the criminal is seated on a low stool with his back against a post. Round his neck is placed an iron collar, and through the back of this and of the post passes a screw with a very thick thread. The screw has a long double handle, and when the prisoner is seated and the collar fixed, the executioner covers his face with a handkerchief, and the priest who is in attendance commences reciting the creed in Spanish, the prisoner repeating it after him. At the words, "His only Son," the executioner gives a half turn with the screw, a crushing sound is heard, and all is over. The handkerchief is then removed, and the body is left seated and leaning against the post till evening.

"Why do all true Bostonians gravitate naturally toward Unitarianism?" asked one clergyman of another, lately, by way of solemn conundrum. "Why," was the answer, "because, having been born in Boston, they cannot conceive it necessary to be born again."

The clergy are just beginning to think that the best way to unite the Church would be to dis-sect it.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE.

The following numbers of THE INDEX for 1873 can no longer be supplied on orders: Nos. 167 (March 8), 169 (March 22), 170 (March 29), 171 (April 5).

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1873, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Leach, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age,—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toilsome attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address

The Averill Chemical Paint.

THE HANDSOMEST AND MOST DURABLE EXTERIOR PAINT.

Costs Less, and will Outlast any other.

Gen. G. R. Smith, Sedalia, Mo., writes:—"Two coats of 'Averill' covered better, and looked finer, than three coats of Lead and Oil, with a coat of varnish thereon. I would not again use Lead and Oil were it given to me."

Levi Shaw, Trustee of the Society of Quakers Mt. Lebanon, writes:—"The buildings painted with the Averill White Paint some three and a half years since, I have examined, and found it retains the gloss nearly if not quite as well as when first put on. It is the best paint we have ever used."

THE LITERARY WORLD.

A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

"This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1873. It has been the aim of its conductor to make it an acceptable, vehicle of honest and trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers."

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorials, brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, says: "I have been a constant reader of thy paper, the LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deferring to its judgment in the purchase of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiment in this direction seems to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared."

The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testament. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution", by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. OF URBANA UNIVERSITY.

1 volume, crown 8vo. $1.50.

"In this charming treatise, M. Emile Saigey gives a very lucid account of the latest mode of speculating on the Physical Facts of the Universe. It is a mode which may be described as bringing all the resources of modern science to the proof of the fact that the human mind is incapable of any intelligible conception of physical facts which does not resolve itself into matter and motion. There is in fact but one science under many names, and that science is mechanics. Atoms, and the laws which regulate their movements,—this is all our material universe."—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Law of Inspiration.

ABSTRACT OF A DISCOURSE DELIVERED BEFORE THE 2ND CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY, BOSTON, MAY 3, 1871.

BY SAMUEL JOHNSON.

I have sometimes seen it stated in the name of radical religion, that the belief in inspiration is to be supplanted by belief in aspiration. And as I do not easily consent to drop any well recognized element of spiritual or practical life, I incline to inquire in what special sense these words are taken by a criticism which seems to employ one term or pole of a spiritual process to cancel the correspondent and equally essential opposite pole.

The critics I refer to are accepting the definition, not of a fact, but of a term in its dogmatic degeneracy. They interpret inspiration to mean supernatural influence. But why should they thus interpret a word which has so many other than dogmatic meanings? I suspect that, counting things to be explicable solely from below upwards, they believe only in ascent of forces, and regard whatever implies their descent,—in other words, the necessity of the higher to the lower, of the infinite to the finite, of influx for which experience does not account,—as in some sense equivalent to the lawlessness and unreality of supernaturalism. Precisely here, I think, lies their mistake. I quite deny that the descent of force, or rather the instant and constant implication of the infinite in all processes of finite ascent, which is the real substance of inspiration, is in any proper sense supernatural. Inspiration is not only co-extensive with Nature, but a part of its process of growth.

What then is the Law of Inspiration? "Inspiration under law?" Not exactly: not under law, but itself law. Our age sweeps away exclusive dogmas, drops assumed infallibilities of books and men, dispels the last and most persistent of theological idols—the God throned outside the universe, planning about it, working on it as a builder on a house, as a lord on his vassals, a slayer on his pawns—sloughs off every disparaging estimate of human faculties. Yet all this it clears the way to appreciating the law of inspiration. 'Tis no mechanical possession, no miraculous election; it cannot even be comprehended till such conceptions are laid aside. There are natural conditions for it; these fulfilled, it comes and must come forever.

These conditions are not dogmatic. I cannot call any doctrine as such inspired, on the ground that it is to be taken as final and obsolete; nor of any special formula of science or philosophy. Inspiration meant finality, I should deny that any statement could be inspired. Expressing only a conception which must always change with progress, every statement is more or less provisional. Whether it be religious statements such as are gathered into what are called Bibles, or a scientific statement such as our systems of classification give, which a distinguished professor has actually pronounced signs of our power to read the actual thoughts of God,—it is impossible it should be final, or fully represent even the approaching higher stages of our knowledge. There is no final Church, no final religious name, no absolute name for religion. Inspiration were a poor thing if it could be monopolized or crystallized; if it were a stunted, arbitrary donation, a bit of divine scheme for saving man, or for instructing him. No! it is inexhaustible Nature, in her mystic descents that condition ascents; rain and sunshine for the herb of the field; his always, everywhere, inevitably, who shall conform to its law. "Good men," says Seneca, "are in God's intimacy. He prepares them for himself by disciplines. The benignant Father never leaves them in ease." The law runs through the whole compass of Nature. Its highest form I should state thus: Inspiration is that immediate, unpredicted aid which comes to meet the aspirations of all unselfish and becoming life, out of the unexplored heights of spiritual personality. And in spheres not directly moral and spiritual, it has forms of progress analogous to this and in harmony with it.

When the forces of human character concentrate in self-surrender to an idea, to a principle, to a sympathetic appreciation, to a common good, there is a forward plunge (it is nothing less) out of self, out of the past, out of experience, into unknown depths; ties apparently indispensable are unbroken; resources lost; desires let go; there is no pledge of support or aid in the open cleft of sacrifice before it: yet just then, out of that very cleft descends a mysterious reinforcement, fresh life as from infinite life, which fills the gulf of conflict, the strait of duty, with beauty and delight. This unpredicted, unexplained energy—not possible before, not in any of the elements of that step, unlike any of them, born in the instant of this concurrence of human powers, is the cleft and gulf of this transition into a larger, and so in some sense, a universal life—is Inspiration.

It is the fine radiance you see in a child's face when for the first time he has silenced the cry of a selfish desire, or spoken truth to his own loss, or indignantly defended the right side against the stronger. It is the exhilaration and vigor which attend the acceptance of a nobler attraction, shattering lower affinities and narrower interests, and the egoism of fixed ideas, experiences, associations. And it is born within these brave ventures of moral enterprise and association, as inevitably as the hills are flooded with glory as they roll one after another into the morning light. Such the fact and such its conditions; indicating at least that the steps of growth are more than the mere push and pressure upward of finite lower forces. That, when strength and love unite in striking free from somewhat that is limiting and selfish, the shattering plunge should not be into the dark; that "steps of faith should fall on the void and find the rock beneath;" that the rainbows should appear above it, the green meadows of song beyond,—past all doubt involves the action of attractive and creative forces, not only freer and larger than these actual voluntary ones, but even limitless and universal. It proves the correlation of descent with ascent, of inspiration with aspiration, of infinite with finite, in all steps of spiritual evolution.

The ascending spiral of this law may be traced through all the grades of being.

Physical nature foreshadows it to the highest extent of physical possibilities. Where there is atomic change, the shattering of old combinations, there is the condition for infusing of a higher energy. So long as the atoms hold themselves free, leave old attitudes for new, grace and symmetry of form is perfecting itself by a force from above the mineral world; and that force is what we call crystallization. Again in the self-loosing of powers from their hold of certain substances, they unite in a flash of splendor which proclaims the incoming of the nobler element of fire: and this we call electricity. Chemical affinities are developed in the separation of elements from their earlier homes, forming new compounds not to be confounded with the qualities of either or both. Color is the shattering of the white ray upon the opposing reefs of solid substances. That radiant play on the face of the universe is more than the original sunbeam, more than the reflecting earth, more than the conducting atmosphere, more than eyeball and optic nerve had in them each and all. In the shock of change, in the transition from physical and mental conditions, a new and higher potency bursts forth to transfigure all things, and the world becomes poetry and spiritual meaning. Shall we try to answer Beethoven's question to Goethe: "I would fain know what music is, for my soul yearns after it as for eternal life"? Science would call it the unity of tones, that in ways manifold and mysterious sacrifice their separate being to form melodies and harmonies. But this does not state the whole process, still less decide the result. That which soars out through the process is more than all tones: the tenderness and the joyousness; the prayer, the vow, the self-surrender, the high resolves; conflict, divine sorrow, immortal bliss.

Now start afresh at the lowest form of animal life. Protoplasm, the cell, or whatever the primal living matter, forsakes its homogeneousness. It is in the moment of that division that there appears the inspiration of vital growth. The cellular substance lets go its simplicity to dare new and nobler combinations in fibre, bone, and nerve, gland, ganglion, special form and function; and so there enters the inspiration of true structure, of proper bodily organization. This harmony of beauty and strength, while it irradiates the body, is scarcely of the body, but the incoming rather of a purer fire, blended inextricably with the immortal part. This is the inspiration of physical structure. How it flashes and mounts with whatever stirs the flagging atoms to swifter self-surrender, to bolder dissolution of tissue, to more lavish expenditure of effort, so they go not too far! Note, too, how it grows by voluntary discipline. Soon as the growing child begins to be conscious of definite purposes, and to expend the labor necessary, see how it begins to glow in his cheek, to flash in his eye, to turn every motion of his limbs into grace! Then, the more he earns his pleasure by self-help, or surrender of ease, the brighter burns this morning light of youth upon his brow. This is physical inspiration, vehicle of spiritual; a higher force concealed in the surrender of a lower, a more self-confined. For mark the condition. Let him become introverted, self-involved, abstracted, avoiding the family circle, playground, society of his equals. This glow will die out. To have the bodily fires turn to cold, is the penalty of habits that imprison one in his self-indulgence as in a cell: whether they be habits of idleness, of morbid suspicion, brooding over fancied wrongs, or of self-commiseration, refusing to let go petted sorrows. It is the penalty of being without directive aim or quickening motive. Do they start an idea of somewhat to live for, a task dearer than its own ease, in one of these decaying bodies,—and the blood begins to mount, the eye to speak, the feet to tread firm and free.

Another fact. One sees men of feeble vitality,—women hovering on the brink of death,—not only kept alive, but made competent to incessant toil and great achievement, solely by the mastership of an ideal purpose over their selfward instincts. I am persuaded that, merely as healthful stimulus to the national physique, ideas will be found to have been one of the most productive forces of our civilization; a science of natural forces as yet not fairly dealt with by our physicist statisticians and experience philosophers—our Buckles, Drapers, Stuart Mills. So the enthusiastic pursuit of a profession will make a naturally infirm man a prodigy of work-power in his own line. What is the force? Not muscle and nerve. Prudent living has sometimes plainly nothing to do with it. The very rapidity of waste under this form of enthusiasm seems to stimulate an extraordinary energy of repair. The race that made the Phidian Jove and the Pallas of the Acropolis its physical ideals, must have been, not only the most perfectly developed, but the most radiant of races, glowing with a transcendence that brought the body into intimate relations with the finest notions of genius, making Alcibiades the scholar of Socrates, and the Athenian people subtle critics of Homer and Æschylus, of the historians, the sculptors, and the orators.

In the intellectual sphere, the inspiration that giveth all men understanding begins for them in the first outgo from themselves: a scarce tangible germ of sacrifice, breaking up the inert homogeneity of this death in life. With this first effort enters the power for yet greater effort. Here is our law presiding at the very birth of intellect. Of all mental growth the real soundness is in discipline and devotion, in processes of sacrifice. No genius is clear-sighted or healthy without this. The minds that have told on history have without exception been hard-working ones. To a sound, clear, sustained, practical, wide-reaching intelligence, there is no "royal road." Carlyle describes genius as being first of all "transcendent capacity for taking trouble." It is the quality of high genius to be able to go out of self, to enter and assume other natures. Its nature is so sympathetic, so dramatic, it is forever dying to be born into other lives. In this assumption, by fullest recognition, of manifold phases of experience, is not only its divine humanity, its eternal validity, but its inspiration. Do not the fine expansions and fresh recognitions that come to us in the reading of Romola or Middlemarch, or even in the simpler sphere, in the hearing of Jefferson's Rip Van Winkle, give hint what recreative energies must have attended the steps of self-transcendence of which these wonders of modern genius are the reward? Right living is a fine art whose bloom and charm do not differ in kind from the inspiration of the world-poet, dramatist, seer. Not the discipline of sacrifice, only, but its courage we want; to forsake what has become inert in our experience, to plunge into untried opportunity, to detect the better future shaping in the present. On go the signs and wait for none: interpret, interpret, or you will be daily growing deaf and dumb and blind! Courage, courage forever to re-test and readjust the old persuasions, to dismiss complacent finality, and live like pious Socrates, in the conviction that wisdom is knowing how little one knows of himself and others, and that knowledge is an endless process of becoming: not only in such beliefs as are provisional, but in such as are necessary and vital, and not dependent on reasonings or votes, but which demand ever wiser apprehension of their meaning. Do not fear to drop any name or communion that you have found obsolete or irrelevant; when it is shed off with pangs, it has left room for a better.

Trace this law in the social and historical spheres. No race makes progress until it begins to curb the rude instincts of self-indulgence, and dares the steps of discipline. Tribes that cannot do this cannot be civilized, any more than our actual American politics can make pure patriot voters out of San Domingo cockfighters or Alaskan savages. Our experiment with the Indians, if it fails, will more discredit the teacher than the pupil he ends by destroying. A scandal to our civilization is the outcry we have heard that a whole Indian tribe must be exterminated for an act of treachery and bloodshed perpetrated by a few chiefs, who have been but too apt pupils in the barbarisms of government agencies and border white warfare. Here is a race subject for generations to all manner of foul, deceitful, and abominable usage, so outraged that officials of our own confess that the cause of even this last Modoc treachery lies at our doors; yet with a dozen broken treaties and a half-century of swindling and pushing to the wall scored against us in the record of our dealing with this perishing race, we cry out for their extermination because the Indian is too treacherous to be trusted even with his own life. "He has dared to murder an American general whom everybody loved and honored." What is Gen. Canby to the Modoc, more than the last of his own tribe who was shot or poisoned by white marauders, or spoiled of his red squaw by some ruffian worse than himself? In face of much progress in civilized life by many tribes, a distinguished general is reported to have said that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian." This is our war-whoop. If the humane Indian policy fails, it will not be merely because we have so long put off the effort to rouse disciplines of self-restraint in a race peculiarly unsuceptible of them, but because we have so long corrupted even them by our example, and repelled them by our evil usage, till such capacity to learn any good from us as they may have had is gone.

Look at the oldest civilizations. What means their absence of progress? For the special kind of sacrifice whereof they had great measure they received splendid fruit. In India an inspiration of the speculative faculty unsurpassed; but in so far as they covered themselves in their speculative dream, not daring to shatter that spell, came passive somnambulism, and not progress. Out of the nomad North and striving West came movement and friction, opening man's eyes wide to the actual world; out of the science of the practical races came innerness or the exact reality of what is expended and what is sought. And the sacrifice that proceeds on these conditions is progress: the modern faith and hope.

America has had three epochs of inspiration. The first was the Day of the Pilgrims, when ecclesiastical traditions were shattered and local ties broken. The next was the day of the Declaration of Independence. This time it was more than an outward home or a visible Church from which the exiles struck out into unknown seas: it was the political household, the ancestral traditions of a race. And this sacrifice made us a nation. But a more radical renunciation was inevitable: nobler ideals strike at the pride of race and the selfishness of trade; and our third great day came in its hour. Again the surrender of traditions, associations, institutions; bursting of fixed ideas; shattering of interests held close as life. Need I point to those days that slowly wrought out our emancipation, to show that the inspiration of our sacrifice greatened with every step toward rejection of an old ingrained bondage; was greatest of all when the full word was spoken which broke utterly from the past? When peace returned, what darkened the flame but the hope of saving that past?

For the last quarter of a century emancipation has been our divine school of morals, friendship, noble aims. That fount of sacrifice, loyalty, inspiration, is now a shrine of the past. What have we to-day in its place? Reform of public morality? But then this will have to obey self-transcending impulses. It must be the gathering voice of multitudes, loving right better than gain, failure and integrity better than subservience and success: the rising ardor, the commanding purpose of men and women inspired by their own brave surrender of ease and prejudice to duty and to truth.

Well does a writer put the representation principle in politics in one sentence: "The small waves make the great ones, and all are of the same pattern." To shift the kindling of that moral ardor which is national safety and progress upon an organized body of agents, is to sow chaff and look for harvests. The petted agency is alive indeed, but it is alive with the fatal tendency of organizations to finality and egoism. National centralization and State sovereignty are the two fatal extremes of these vicarious politics, committing the making of virtue to organizations which can supplant inspiration, but not originate it. 'Tis the unorganized virtue of the citizens that must supply the all-mastering flame to melt away threatening usurpation in executive, legislature, and judiciary.

The law of inspiration dominant in the inanimate, the animal, the intellectual, and the political realms, and leading them up into the moral and spiritual, may well be trustworthy, nay, absolute in these. If then your strength is not great enough to set aside the duty of a step when your hope lies only in what you see not, still less is your weakness capable of foreclosing the inspirations which such steps assure. Out of your own hands you have passed into the hands of a law, reaching as wide as being; you open upward for the infinite. You cleave the one natural path for the sunbeam to the waiting elements of your soul.

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

THANKS FOR THE EDITORIAL entitled "Pause." Pause—why not? Will any humane, practical man answer? Why is it that the great mass of people must never "rest from their labors" while yet in the flesh, and their work never follow them to enrich them here? Is it wonderful that they sigh for the herafter? The earth "owned" by a handful, and yet the common home of all! Land speculators! will you show your title to the wild, virgin soil? Was the earth made for you to fatten on, and these to starve? You inherit land? Pardon me, so did the slaveholders inherit souls. Go back far enough, and you will find the flaw in your title. Trace back your "apostolic succession," and you will find that the primitive land-owner was a grabber. No man ever took possession of more land than he could cultivate or turn to a public good, who did not trample on human rights. One man guarding his million acres, and a million people crowded into attic and cellar! The Indian, forsooth, must give way for civilization. He has no right to hold vast tracts of earth for a "hunting ground." No: take it from him, and give it over to the white speculator. Well, now, which is which? Is not the same land still a "hunting ground"? Will not civilization have to make still another move? Civilization says, "The land, the air, and the sea belong to all men." The Indian, of whatever color, must abandon his private claim. Humanity owns the continent, and the Modocs must go to the wall. Everybody has a right to a home!

Well, and what then? Why, "when capital and labor are rightly adjusted and come to be mutual friends, not foes," things will begin to straighten out and work well. True. But how? How shall capital and labor become friends? What is capital? Labor stowed away: "dried labor," says my friend. When people eat all the apples they want, they dry the rest for future use, or to exchange for something else. So then, whose labor are you stowing away? Your own? If that is the way you get your capital, how will it be possible for that sort of capital to become the foe of labor? True, your father may do the stowing, and then bestow the same upon you; or any friend may. No one will be wronged in that way; for still each other laborer may receive and hold fast all he produces. Thus related, capital and labor shall indeed be "friends, not foes."

Pause, then, and consider this fair vision: Land set free, redeemed, cultivated; prairie and wilderness blossoming into homes; business interests no more conflicting, but harmonizing; the prosperity of all the prosperity of each; each man's capital the accumulations of his own earnings, or of labor that came to him a free gift; the disappearance on the earth of the two classes, rich and poor, because of this security of property given to each and all.

Let civilization, thus aroused, take a new start: and all men then in good time may "pause!"

LAST SUNDAY, the preacher who stood in Dr. Fulton's old shoes at Tremont Temple preached a sermon suggested by the Anniversaries. He said that, during Anniversary week, infidels and all sorts of evil-dreamers held the field, the name of Jesus being seldom spoken except in derision; and the jargon of conflicting voices strongly reminded him of Babel. The one word of union, he said, seemed to be "Nay;" and, for one, he desired now that the din was over to fall back on God's "Yea." And, as I listened to his discourse, I perceived that that was his mistake—a mistake in fact which we are all prone to make. We "fall back" on the "Yea" of the past, forgetting that the "Yea" of the present time must inevitably take on something of the sound of "Nay." If we propose an advance, of course we say, "No; this is not our journey's end." Could our preacher fall forward, he might hear a God's "Yea" that would astonish and comfort him.

Still, it must be confessed that Anniversary week does get a little mixed. Every man and woman who comes here has an idea of what is wrong, and of the remedy; and it is hardly to be expected that so general a comparison of views would result in a strain of perfect harmony for delicately-tuned ears. It is not best, however, to be too nice and fine. Thence we may miss the key-note of the new anthem.

I think Anniversary week in Boston always has a "Yea," and a very emphatic one. It says "Yea" to human nature, to faith in the ability of the race to perfect itself. Its "Nay" is hurled against doubt, fear, and (as I heard one say) "the respectability of the devil." Undoubtedly the majority of people are opposed to having their doubts and fears, their Orthodoxy and respectability, negatived,—particularly in the rude way of the reformers. But the reformers feel that the un-reformatory world is pretty nearly iron-clad, and they are in duty bound to see that the impenetrable stuff is somehow pierced. The anti-slavery leaders set the example. Not all of them now like to witness the faithfulness with which their methods are adhered to. Often one hears these sturdy veterans abuse this latter-day agitation as "fanatical," "absurd," "impracticable," "foolish," and quite in vain. It hardly comes gracefully from such lips. There is hot blood yet in the land, though theirs (they having honorably wrought their work) has measurably cooled. The "infidelity" and reform of the week may not all be wise; but that its burden is not humanity's "Yea," I religiously question.

MY OWN INTEREST in these Anniversaries centred in the meetings of the New England Labor Reform League, and of the Free Religious Association,—the former held at the beginning and the latter at the close of the week. I am especially attracted by both of these movements, because neither of them runs into politics. I have a great distrust of political remedies. I think we are fast learning that people who take the ballot must perish by the ballot, as they who take the sword perish by that instrument. There are two edges to both of these weapons, and wrongs which they right never come out as right as they should.

THE AIM of the Labor Reform League appears to be the discovery and diffusion of equitable principles to regulate the social and practical business-life of the community. There is no vote taken, but the whole subject, after it has received its many-sided presentation, is remanded to the intelligence of each private mind. In this way it is hoped that a new and wiser public sentiment will in good time prevail, and settle this whole question of labor and capital peaceably and justly, and so permanently. The meetings this year were extremely interesting and instructive. No other meeting that I attended was more so.

OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS MEETINGS much might be said. On the whole the day was quite successful. To speak of the gathering in the evening first, I have heard but one opinion. Everybody was happy. The cheerful hall most tastefully decorated, the goodly company, Col. Higginson's splendid management, the Hutchinsons and others who could nobly sing, and Lucrècia Mott,—not to forget the eatables: altogether all this made up an evening which one can remember much better than describe.

Upon reading the announcement for the essays and discussion of the day, I was quite encouraged to believe that this year's Anniversary would mark an important departure of the Association in the direction of applying Free Religion to practical life. The subjects—"Freedom in Religion," and "Religion in Freedom"—seemed to imply a disposition to try the liberal faith on, and see how it would fit. Nor was this expectation wholly disappointed. Of Mr. Johnson's essay I shall not be able to speak until I read it in the published Report. I know full well that it was a statement worthy of all consideration and large acceptance. But it is not easy to report Mr. Johnson from memory, and the attempt were rash.

The same might be said of Mr. Weiss' essay. His writings, however, abound with epigrams, and a few sentences often reveal the drift of the discourse. In this case, for instance, when he said that Abraham Lincoln had before this apprised Daniel Webster that there was a higher law than the Constitution, one may take the lead of his thought and see that he is running the line between "legality and the divine law." He speaks of "laws regulating conscience, and of conscience that regulates laws."

In these discourses I think we shall find the suggestion of that fuller interpretation of religion and religious liberty which the age demands. Religious liberty must come to mean somewhat more than the bare privilege of worshipping God sentimentally. One's conscience has to do with all the relations of life. And the legal restriction or compulsion which tramples on the private conscience we shall come to regard, I doubt not, as an invasion of religious liberty. We must take our own definition of religion. It is "Man's effort to perfect himself," says Mr. Abbot. This may not be the whole truth, but it is certainly a part of it. And this "effort"—shall it not be respected? Think, then, in how many ways the State—whether republican or monarchical—sets at naught the liberty we boast of. The invasions which Christian zeal has made in the forms of civil law by no means exhaust the category. For the greater part, what we call "the State" is an impertinence. How do we get on with our reliance upon it as a remedy for crime? What security of person and property does it bring? There is much more in these simple questions than our politically crazed countrymen are disposed to think. "Private judgment," "self-government," "local option," and like phrases which we cherish, will some day assume a significance now quite startling to most people. The man who has no more promising ideal of a free country than that we now adore, is by far too easily satisfied. Not even an honest Congress and an intelligent President should be regarded as a very great blessing.

That the drift of the discussions at the Free Religious meetings was away from this straight-faced worship of "legality," marks, in my judgment, an era in Free Religion to be remembered.

BOSTON, June 8, 1873.

INSINCERITY IN SPEECH.—Say what you think, rather than what you imagine other people expect you to say. Or if you feel, as we often may, that we had better not, or not then, say what we think, say nothing. At any rate, believe that it is a genuine promotion of the health of society to let our words be honestly ours. Affect no sentiments which you do not own. I do not, of course, refer to those phrases of courtesy which are universally current and understood, as when a man sets his signature to the statement that he is an obedient servant to one whom perhaps he has just been declining to serve. Nor do I mean that we are expected to give utterance to each sentiment which arises in our hearts. That would be selfish. But do not, especially in religion, affect feelings which are alien to you. It is incalculable what wanton harm is done by this. We can see it when a man, more honest than others, ventures to put some criticism, which has risen in many minds, into words; or, Luther-like, to question some empty dictum which has been long tacitly permitted to exist. By a touch he can thus free many a mind. He simply makes bold to open the door and let himself out; and lo! he has provided an exit for a grateful stream of prisoners who follow him, and then see that after all they might just as well have delivered themselves.—Leisure Hour.

A country exchange tells this story: Our little four-year-old went over to see his grandma the other day, and was told to go directly home and tell his papa that grandma had the varioloid, and he must be vaccinated; whereupon the little fellow came running home, breathless, saying: "Grandma has got the very old lord, and I must be baptized."

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XXII.

"MY NATIVE LAND, GOOD NIGHT!"

The massive walls of the gray old tower of London, and the dingy regions adjacent, were alternately brightened by the flicker bursts of sunshine on an April day, or rendered additionally sombre by its sudden showers. The streets were muddy and wet; and in obedience to the summons of a clanging bell announcing the hour of one, P. M., a continuous stream of stevedores, sailors, lightermen, "lumpers," porters, "barges," longshoremen, and waterside laborers in general, was setting, from their mid-day meal, inwards, at the principal gate of St. Katharine's Docks, when there drew up before it two cabs, whence alighted a party of individuals to whose proceedings the history now invites attention. Out of the first stepped Paul and Ruth Gower, and two of Mr. Bligh's pupils; namely, Purdy and Grayling: from the second emerged Frank Sabin, Harry Franklin, and his sister Esther; also the red beard and perpetual cigar of "Mops"—which "weed" he was obliged to throw away, or at least extinguish, before entering the portal. From the seat beside the driver there likewise descended the spare and shabby figure, and wistful, propitiatory countenance of poor Mills. The day had at length arrived for the embarkation of our friends for America. But Richard Sabin was not of the company. Richard Sabin was absent.

Paul could not repress a glance of forlorn expectation at the second cab—not for his friend, but for Kate—though he apprehended she would not be there; nor a look of disappointment when there was no longer room for doubt on the subject. The vehicles dismissed, and the final, inevitable, all-but-forgotten luggage consigned to a couple of volunteer porters in waiting for such jobs, a general introduction of those of the party who were unacquainted with each other took place, followed by inquiries for Richard.

"He promised to be here sharp one," said Mops, consulting his watch, "but of course is behind-hand. Let's go on to the vessel." And, arm in arm, in such order as their intimacy prompted, they proceeded in the direction of the Basin—along great wharves and under immense warehouses of grimy brick, six stories in height, framing squares of shipping, the huge hulls of which lay side by side, apparently jammed together in inextricable confusion, their monstrous figure-heads staring at the granite quays with the same wooden stolidity with which they had, in their time, contemplated strange cities, howling tempests, and the sunny islands of far-off seas.

"I am so glad, dear," said Ruth to her brother, as they walked on together, "that grandma came round so nicely, after all, and that you parted such good friends. She is kinder of heart than she gives herself credit for, or than we are apt to suppose. She felt your going away more than you expected."

"She did," he answered, suppressing a regret that Mrs. Gower's affection had waited till that rather late stage for its development. "And I was sorer to leave the old house than I had anticipated. She has changed a good deal—in temper—ever since the receipt of our father's letter."

"Yet it disappointed her exceedingly, for she quite made up her mind that he'd come home. I only wish he had. Paul, dear, you mustn't forget to send me a photograph of him as soon as possible—a good one, mind—and always to write me good long letters. I'll be sure to answer them and tell you everything."

"I hope you will," responded Paul, seriously; "and about Mr. Bligh. You mustn't think me unkind or ungenerous, but I don't half like that gentleman's return to Thorpe Parva. My sister's happiness is very dear to me, and I should be sorry to think it risked by too great a confidence in a quarter in which she has been once deceived already. Why couldn't the Squire find a place for him elsewhere, and leave it to time to show whether he is really as deserving as seems taken for granted?"

Ruth colored deeply before replying. "I told you how it all happened in my letters. Nothing is as yet settled. But since our cousin (she called Mr. Blencowe cousin in familiar conversation) caught that dreadful fresh cold in burying poor old Goody Simcoe, he is really incapable of preaching; and as he won't hear of a regular curate, we are glad to avail ourselves of Mr. Bligh's services. And, Paul, you should remember: 'Forgive our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us.' I think men find that harder to practise than women do."

"Very probably. And God forbid that I should forget it. Only, Ruth, be careful. There are two kinds of faults—those that originate in want of thought, and those that indicate want of principle. It's easy, I think, and right to forgive the first, until seventy times seven and over; but the last commonly argues some radical defect of character, which may break out again at any time, and is, perhaps, incurable. If you'd excuse my spouting Shakespeare, I'd say—

"Fear it Ophelia; fear it, my dear sister;
And keep you in the rear of your affection,
Out of the shot and danger of—" loving a man who is not worthy of you. If he proved weak and selfish in one instance, he may break out again in the same direction. You are not angry with me?"

"I'm not angry; but since I'm Ophelia, let me remind you that she retorts her brother's advice upon himself. Think over that last sentence of yours in connection with Miss Sabin."

Finding the tables thus neatly turned on him, Paul thought it better to change the subject; and, by way of doing so, first asked her if a great iron or wooden umbrella shielding a huge crane which they chanced to be passing, didn't remind her of Robinson Crusoe; and then began to speak of his departure. Ruth, he it remarked, had resolved to be very brave at it, and above all things not to cry.

"It is curious," he said, after some observations not of sufficient importance to this history to demand insertion, "to be going to a father of whom I remember next to nothing. It has always seemed to me as if I were an orphan. He must be very much altered and Americanized in so many years. I wonder what he is like, and whether I shall come up to his expectations or disappoint them."

"Of course he'll be delighted!" decided Ruth; and proceeded to give reasons for that opinion, which, whatever their intrinsic merit, were at least complimentary to the persons concerned. Unlike Paul, she was sentimental about her unknown father, and entertained none of the morbid habit of distressing herself and sometimes others, which characterized her brother; though his manifestation of it, in this instance, had not been very seriously meant. This feeling, by the way, by no means militates against the existence of the average amount of self-esteem so kindly allotted by Nature to most of us: indeed, proves it, for self-depreciation is only self-esteem with the seamy side outwards.

"Here we are, then," said Paul, as having skirted the inner side of the West Dock—under cover of long sheds, past little counting-houses on wheels, avenues of barrels exuding oils, alkalis, and chemical smells, piles of rare woods, and other valuable but not very sightly merchandise, and successfully avoiding the trucks which men were wheeling about in all directions—the party reached the vessel in which the friends had engaged passage. It was a Baltimore-built clipper, named the "Cayuga," not ordinarily an emigrant ship, but one which, returning to New York City with a cargo of hemp and iron, took as many passengers as she could get, at very moderate prices.

The "Cayuga" lay with her broadside to the wharf and presented a scene of extreme liveliness and confusion. Men were busy taking in cargo at her open ports and yawning hatchways; sailors were hauling away at ropes; and up and down the frail gangway which connected the vessel with the shore, people went and came incessantly. Passengers, their friends, shipping-agents' clerks, captain, and crew, all exhibited the bustle incidental to departure; yet it seemed as if a good deal remained to be done before that could be effected.

This Mr. Humphries observed and commented on. "You won't get off to-day," he said, when the party stood on the deck together amidst a heterogeneous medley of people and property, watching the process of lowering the heavier portions of the latter down the aft-hatchway, to the accompaniment of a vast amount of bawling and blasphemy.

"You'd better stay aboard, if you don't want to lose your passage!" suddenly answered the mate; a tall, long-necked, snister-looking Yankee, with enormous whiskers, who temporarily desisted from profaning the name of the second person of the Trinity to make the remark.

The Index.

JUNE 21, 1873.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

The columns of THE INDEX are open for the discussion of all questions included under the general purpose.
N. B. No writer in THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

A CARD.

The undersigned, constituting a majority of the newly elected Board of Directors of the Index Association, and being all of those Directors present at the Annual Meeting, except Mr. Abbot, desire to make a brief statement to the stockholders of the Association.

The whole number of votable shares in the Association is 832. The number of shares represented at the Annual Meeting was 652. The number of votes actually cast for Directors was 607. Most of the Directors elected received the full number, while none received less than 532 votes. We therefore fairly represent the Index Association, and may congratulate the stockholders that the troubles of the past year are now practically terminated.

It will be seen by the Treasurer's report that there is no deficit in the Treasury, but a cash balance of $682.06. There is in our opinion no reason why any deficiency should occur hereafter. We, however, think that the enlarged size of the paper should not be renewed until the receipts fully justify it. But that no injustice may be done to the subscribers, we have voted to continue the paper to all who pay $3, for a time long enough to give them the full value of their payment.

In accordance with a vote passed almost unanimously at the Annual Meeting, we have reinstated Mr. Abbot as editor in chief of THE INDEX. He is authorized to employ such aid as may be necessary, within the means of the Association, especially in the business department. We have also appointed Mr. A. W. Stevens as Associate Editor.

It is our opinion that the true interests of THE INDEX demand its early removal to Boston or New York, as being the best centres for the publication of a national journal; and the Directors have been expressly authorized by the Association to take such action on the subject as may be found desirable and legal.

We earnestly commend THE INDEX anew to the full confidence of those who have hitherto sustained it so cordially. We believe that it will deserve this confidence more fully in the future than even in the past.

T. W. HIGGINSON,
A. E. MACOMBER,
W. J. POTTER,

A. W. STEVENS,

Directors of the Index Association.

SALUTATORY.

With this issue I resume my former duties as editor of THE INDEX. For the expressions of unabated confidence on the part of the stockholders of the Index Association and of the newly elected Board of Directors which have enabled me with entire self-respect to accept this renewed appointment, I tender my sincere thanks. A more complete vindication of my past course as editor and business manager I could neither ask nor desire; and it will be my earnest endeavor to make the future at least as deserving as the past of the aid hitherto so generously accorded to THE INDEX by its friends. I cannot but congratulate them all that the paper will still be devoted to the aims which first enlisted their sympathy and support; and I trust that continued devotion to these aims will make the wretched strife of the last few months a speedily forgotten nightmare.

It would be gross ingratitude, however, not to record here the fact that, but for Mr. Stevens, all efforts to rescue the paper from the dangers that beset it must have failed. No one not in the office could fully appreciate the difficulty and delicacy of his position as Acting Editor under the circumstances; and, knowing as I do the utterly noble and unselfish spirit, the scrupulous desire to be just to all parties, and the willingness to discharge unexpected duties under the most disadvantageous conditions, with which he has met all emergencies during these weary and disheartening months, I hope that every friend of the paper will keep a warm corner in his heart for one of the most faithful, disinterested, and modest of men.

I can hardly persuade myself to omit all mention of one other without whom THE INDEX could never have weathered the storm; but I very reluctantly yield to his urgent wish, and content myself with knowing that every close observer of INDEX affairs will see for himself, and award the credit where it is due. (I ought to add that what is said above was written without the knowledge of Mr. Stevens.)

Lastly, the staunch devotion to the radical cause which brought so fair a representation of the scattered stockholders of the Index Association, several of whom came eight hundred miles to attend the meeting, shows how vital is the work we are all engaged in, and how willing are its friends to spend and be spent in its service. It is impossible for me to misconstrue this proof of earnestness in any personal way. The late conflict, now (I trust) permanently ended, has not on my part been a personal one at all; it has been a battle for the very existence of THE INDEX as a paper devoted in sincerity to moral and religious reform. I have not enough conceit to appropriate to myself what was meant for the paper and its cause; and if any one came to the meeting moved by no deeper motive than personal regard for me, I can only regret that my labors have been in his case vain. THE INDEX is in no sense mine; it belongs to humanity alone; and stockholders, directors, editors, are alike unfaithful to their trust, if they look upon the paper as aught else than a tool to be used most conscientiously in helping to prepare a purer future for mankind. I refuse to consider the action of June 7 in any other light than as an emphatic affirmation that THE INDEX shall be sacred to Truth, and not to Mammon; and that I shall be its conductor once more simply and solely because, having been faithful to it hitherto, it is believed I shall be faithful to it hereafter. To that fidelity let me be strictly and sternly held; and the moment I forget it, let the stockholders flock together to hurl me from a seat I have disgraced and a trust I have betrayed. To my old post I now come back with joy, because I can come with untainted honor, and with a full conviction that there are enough brave and generous souls in the world to make this old post of mine a place of effective and well-aided toil in a cause most dear to me.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

It is a cause of very pleasant surprise to see that, almost before the ink was dry on the pages of last week's INDEX, so many friends hastened to respond to the suggestion of a "Dollar Donation Fund." The following prompt contributions to this fund are acknowledged with thanks, having been all received by Monday June 16, when the forms were to be made up:—

$1.00 each—H. E. Howe, W. Kraus, H. T. Appleby, J. Sedgebeer, M. Marx, W. G. Babcock, W. H. Badger, H. P. Hyde, W. H. Boughton, W. P. Chambers, C. K. Whipple, J. F. Barrett, W. H. Sherman, E. S. Barrows, S. Hunt; $2.00—H. K. O.—; $5.00 each—W. H. Ovington, Miss H. E. Stevenson.

THE INDEX REDIVIVUS.

The stockholders of the Index Association convened for their second annual meeting at the office of THE INDEX, at Toledo, June 7, 1873. The following stockholders were present: Col. T. W. Higginson, of Newport, Rhode Island; Mr. W. J. Potter, of New Bedford, Massachusetts; Dr. C. H. Horsch, of Dover, New Hampshire; Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, Michigan; Mr. R. C. Spencer, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Mr. E. W. Weir, of Lagrange, Indiana; Mr. Asa K. Butts, of New York city; Mr. S. F. Woodard, of Osborn, Ohio; Mr. J. D. Zimmermann, of Union City, Michigan; and Messrs. A. E. Macomber, E. P. Bassett, H. E. Howe, A. Wood, C. Cone, A. W. Stevens, and F. E. Abbot, of Toledo, Ohio. Mr. J. M. P. Batchelder, of Kendallville, Indiana, was also present.

Col. Higginson was elected Chairman of the meeting, and Mr. Stevens Secretary. On motion of Mr. Potter, it was "Resolved, That at this meeting every share subscribed to the capital stock of the Index Association on which one or more assessments have been paid shall be entitled to one vote. No share on which no assessment has been paid shall be entitled to a vote."

During the official examination of the proxies presented by various parties, which under the above rule was a necessary preliminary to business and occupied considerable time, Mr. Butts proceeded to read a series of resolutions, into the preamble of which he had introduced various voluminous documents relating to the recent disturbances in the Association; and the meeting listened patiently, until he was called to order by Judge Howe and the Chair for gross and repeated violations of the parliamentary rule which prohibits offensive personalities. The resolutions were not seconded.

The report of the Executive Committee for the preceding year, including the Treasurer's report, was read by Mr. Abbot. The report was accepted on motion of Dr. Horsch; and on motion of Mr. Potter, an auditing committee, consisting of Messrs. Howe, Bassett, and Stebbins, was appointed by the Chair.

On motion of Mr. Macomber, the meeting proceeded to the election of Directors of the Index Association for the ensuing year. The following gentlemen were elected: T. W. Higginson, W. J. Potter, R. P. Hallowell, F. E. Abbot, A. E. Macomber, E. W. Meddough, R. H. Ranney, A. W. Stevens, F. J. Scott.

Dr. Horsch then moved the adoption of the following resolution, which was passed:—

"Resolved, That the Board of Directors of the Index Association, this day elected by the stockholders of the same, are hereby authorized to establish an office in such locality as they may deem for the best interests of THE INDEX, and to transfer the publication of THE INDEX to such locality as they may deem expedient and consistent with the laws of this State, under which this corporation exists, and of the State where such office may be established."

Mr. Butts presented a preamble and resolution, calling upon Mr. Abbot for the promised proofs of his statements in THE INDEX of May 3, and calling upon the meeting to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for the detailed investigation of all charges made by either side in the late controversy against the other. No one else being willing even to second this resolution, it was seconded by Mr. Abbot. Some discussion followed. Mr. Bassett said that this was not the place for entering into all the details of the controversy; that the stockholders' meeting was not a court to try any one for libel; and that the press was open to both parties alike, if they chose to use it. Dr. Horsch and Mr. Stebbins said in substance that each side had already presented its case in print, and given sufficient grounds for action at this meeting; that there had been sufficient investigation to warrant a decision, and that there was no occasion to spend more time in the matter. On being put to vote, the resolution of Mr. Butts was lost, no one voting for it but himself.

Mr. Abbot then submitted to the meeting a printed statement [see advertisement elsewhere] containing the promised proofs of his "True Story" as published in THE INDEX of May 3. A copy of this pamphlet was furnished to every person present.

On motion of Mr. Stebbins, the following resolution was put to vote and carried, Mr. Butts alone voting against it:—

"Resolved, That we request the Directors to reinstate F. E. Abbot in his former place and power as editor of THE INDEX; and that this request, made after due investigation of the matter, is the best evidence of our confidence in his integrity and capacity, and in his devotedness to the objects and aims of the Index Association."

The meeting was then adjourned.

The newly elected Directors on June 9 adopted the following, after re-appointing the former editor and associate editor of THE INDEX:—

"Resolved, That in reinstating Mr. Abbot as editor of THE INDEX we would echo the sentiment of the resolution passed at the recent meeting of the stockholders,—that we thereby express our unshaken confidence in the integrity, ability, and disinterested devotion with which he has heretofore performed the duties of the office, as also our decided disapproval of the action of the Directors in the meeting of the 13th of March which led to his resignation; and in this act we conceive that we are but executing the manifest will of almost the entire constituency of the paper."

This appreciative and richly deserved tribute to Mr. Stevens was also passed:—

"Resolved, That we tender, on behalf of the Index Association, earnest thanks to Mr. A. W. Stevens for the very judicious and faithful manner in which he has discharged the obligations of his difficult position as Acting Editor since Mr. Abbot resigned the editorial chair, and during the recent serious troubles in the affairs of the paper."

The only other action of the Board which need be here mentioned was the passage of the following vote:—

"Resolved, That the Executive Committee be authorized and requested to get the best legal advice on the question of establishing the publication office of THE INDEX in Boston or New York; and, if such a step be found to be consistent with the laws of Ohio, they are further authorized to establish said publication office in Boston, provided the sum of $5,000 shall be raised by the friends of the paper for that purpose, or in New York, provided the sum of $10,000 shall be raised by its friends for that purpose."

The difference in the sums named is made on account of the greater expense that will be involved, all things considered, in New York than in Boston. It is hoped that by next week all doubt of the legality of the proposed change will be finally settled; and we shall be glad to receive information and advice on the subject from all interested friends. The proposal to publish the paper in Boston or New York is one of the greatest importance; and the various opinions that may be expressed will all receive the most candid consideration. Let all local preferences be generously waived, and let attention be concentrated on the one question, "Where should THE INDEX be published so as to be most improved in quality and most strengthened in influence?" A brilliant and useful future lies before it now, if wisdom, unselfishness, and free-hearted liberality shall animate its friends. Meanwhile, we urge each one of them—

1. To help increase its circulation by sending in promptly the name of at least one new subscriber, with the money.

2. To help fill up the losses of the stock list caused by the recent troubles.

3. To help place at our disposal a liberal "Dollars Donation Fund," to be applied without delay to healing the wounds inflicted by pseudo-friends.

Forgotten now be the past! Let all eyes be turned to the future, and all hands set heartily to the task of making a paper worthy of the cause it works for!

RELIGION.

The above is a hackneyed word, and there are many free thinkers who hear it almost with impatience. They regard it as pretty nearly synonymous with superstition, and say that what it stands for is at the best but the outcome of ingenious guesses and fine imaginings, which really sensible and practical people would do well not to bother their heads about. To these often excellent and very intelligent people this word religion is an impertinence, because it deals with that which the five senses do not apprehend; with that which is not palpable, tangible, and ponderable.

I am not entirely without sympathy with such objections to the word religion. It is true that it has been mightily wrested to the uses of human folly and superstition, and that it is to-day made the cover of absurd fanaticism and hard-handed dogmatism. If religion is really what the Church says it is; if it is what the popular Christianity defines it to be,—then I cordially agree with those who oppose it, and think that in dropping the very word itself from their vocabulary they are helping to purge our language of an obsolete and useless term. But, on the other hand, if religion is something which belongs to human nature; if the word itself expresses that which is natural to man; if, in short, religion is truly human and natural, not "revealed" and miraculous, the property of humanity and not of the Church,—then I say that those who object to it, who seek to disuse and destroy both the name and the thing, are very unwise and foolish, because they are attempting to do what ought not and cannot be done. Religion is not a historical word like Christianity, or Buddhism. Though priests and bigots have fought over it and claimed it as theirs, it does not belong to them, but to all mankind. It did not have its leave to be when Jesus or any other man was born. Its history is not written in any one Bible or set of sacred scriptures. It is rather a universal word and a universal thing, having an application as extensive as human life, and an existence co-eval with human nature.

It is a delicate and difficult task to define religion. That definition seems to me to be best which is most inclusive. "Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself," says one. While I do not say that this is the best definition of religion which can be given, I am ready to say that, so far as I know, it is the best definition of religion which has been given. I like it because it is so inclusive; because it stretches over the whole of life and humanity, as the dome of the heavens includes the earth. I like it because it vindicates itself to my own experience, and appears to me to be vindicated by the universal experience of man. It is a brave and hopeful definition; it excludes the dogmatisms and subtleties of sectarians and theologians, and expresses a large and inspiring faith in human nature. "The effort of man to perfect himself." This locates the golden age in the future, not in the past; this makes human perfection a hope, not a memory. This also suggests the sublime thing about man—that he is an upward-looking, an upward-struggling, an aspiring being. An aspiring man is a more immediately important truth of religion than a perfect God. The first it behooves us to know now; the last we can wait for until it arrives by rational and legitimate means.

To aspire, to seek for and strive after the best in thought and life,—this is to be religious. Surely this is a definition of religion which the most liberal cannot refuse, and which the most religious must feel the truth of. This is a definition which appears to me to do immense justice to the essential thing itself, and to save the word still for all its most sacred uses. Under this definition, religion is not a question of atheism or theism or pantheism, of materialism or spiritualism; but of real goodness of life, purity of heart, nobleness of character, devotion and exaltation of aim. He is most religious who has the fairest ideal, and who strives most faithfully to lift his actual to it. Thus defined, religion has a past and will have a future as endless as the experience of man. So long as we love what is lovely, aim at what is good, and seek what is true, we shall be religious. So long as we look up and not down, so long as we struggle forward and slide not backward, so long as we "lend a hand" to help others, we shall be religious. The father who loves his sweet little child, and is humble before the infirmities that gaze out from its eyes; the woman who turns to the strong man, and leans on his manhood in trusting confidence and gentle affection; the man who turns to the pure woman, worshipping and loving her womanhood, and feeling his soul grow white under her touch and influence; the hard-handed buyer and seller, and getter of gain, who yet has an eye to the beauty and delicacy of flowers, spending his money freely in their cultivation, and growing soft and tender as he walks and works amongst them; the poor plodder and toiler who sometimes lifts his eyes to look at the hills and the sea, the growing grass and corn, and feels for the moment, in some faint way, the mystery of the universe knocking at the door of his dull brain,—all these are religious, because to a greater or less degree they are each and all under the spell of that which purifies, exalts, and ennobles them; which, in fine, helps to make them "perfect."

The death-day of religion is not yet. It is the great problem of the age how to make men more religious; in other words how to help them to "perfect themselves."

A. W. S.

We hope to be excused under the circumstances for reprinting the following "personal" from the Toledo Sunday Journal of June 15; and we take occasion to renew our thanks to the Germans of Toledo for their hearty and warm support.

SERENADE.—Friday evening the Turnverein Vorwärts, and Teutonia Männerchor of Toledo, joined in complimenting Mr. Abbot with a delightful serenade, in celebration of his recent restoration to the position hitherto occupied by him at the head of THE INDEX.

About 10 o'clock P. M. Milverstedt's Silver Band, the Teutonia Männerchor, and the Turners' Society, in large numbers accompanied by many leading citizens, quietly gathered in front of Mr. Abbot's residence on Indiana Avenue, and the audience listened to such excellent music as this celebrated band and the well-trained Männerchor know how to furnish, which ended with that thrilling, stirring song, the "Watch on the Rhine."

On behalf of the two Societies, Mr. John P. Schuck made a few pertinent remarks expressive of their strong sympathy with Mr. Abbot in his advocacy of the best of causes, their joy over his renewal of old relations with THE INDEX, and their determination to firmly stand by him and it.

Mr. Abbot then briefly and feelingly responded, pledging himself to renewed devotion to the cause of which THE INDEX is the champion, and to strive more than ever to deserve the confidence of his auditors and friends generally.

In response to loud calls, the Hon. Wm. Kraus then addressed the audience with great effect, asserting that the Turnverein Vorwärts throughout the land, and thousands of German citizens besides, were, and ever would be, the fast friends of mental freedom; and that they had supported Mr. Abbot, and would stand firmly by him in his advocacy of that cause, not out of regard for him as a man, simply,—though they held him in the most cordial regard—but because they recognized him as one of the truest and ablest of toilers for the triumph of sublime ideas.

The audience then gave three hearty cheers for Mr. Kraus and Mr. Abbot,—

"When each took off his several way, Resolved to meet some other day."

A TERRIBLE CASE.—There may be woes worse than those of poverty. An English editor recounts his visit to a clerical friend, who feeds and clothes his family of ten on an income of £140 a year. He found husband and wife in tears, and the children crying in chorus. Visions of want flashed, of course, over the visitor's mind, but his ready proffer of aid was declined. "It is not that, not that," sobbed the poor preacher; "but I see that the Athanasian creed—the bulwark of our faith—will probably be rejected by the Church. This is the first step towards infidelity." For such grief there was no consolation. Father, mother, and eight children were weeping together over the possible loss of the dogma of eternal damnation.—The Rectitudinarian (Chicago).

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.

N. B.—Articles for this department should be SHORT, and written only on one side of the sheet.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

N. B.—No responsibility will be assumed for unused manuscripts.

IMMORAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

A few months ago my attention being called to THE INDEX by a controversial statement in the Independent, I sent for a few specimen copies.

I was much pleased to find its moral standard high in the literary department, and turned at once to the advertising columns to see if the usual hiatus existed between the theory and the practice of religious papers.

To my delight—yes, and surprise—I found absolutely nothing which was objectionable. There was a certain pride in being able to show to friends a sheet built upon the (to them) sandy foundation of Natural Religion, without a perceptible moral flaw.

A few weeks later, in the issue of March 29, there appeared a "Business Notice," stating that "the business and editorial departments of THE INDEX have been separated by vote of the Board of Directors, neither to be responsible for the acts of the other."

So the stale trick was to be rehearsed once more of elevating humanity with the right hand and thrusting it down with the left,—of preaching the gospel of righteousness and practising the law of gain!

Sure enough, the very next week brought an advertisement of a patent medicine headed, "Iron in the Blood."

Do any of the readers of THE INDEX question the immorality of such an advertisement? To offer for sale any article whose use will evidently injure a greater number than it will benefit, is an immoral act. That such is the effect of patent medicines is a notorious fact among intelligent men, and no business manager should be able to offer the excuse of ignorance. A person of sense cannot read the promises contained in the advertisement to which I refer (which is one of the better sort) without seeing at a glance that it is an attempt to deceive.

If, however, it spoke only the truth, and were composed of the very ingredients to which it lays claim, still the assertion would hold good that it must injure far more than it helps.

O. W. Holmes laid down the principle to a class of graduates in medicine that every drug administered does a certain amount of harm, and that a dose should never be given unless the ultimate good would more than counterbalance the immediate injury. The truth of this advice is unquestionable. To make such a decision correctly requires an intimate acquaintance both with the medicine prescribed and with the patient to whom it is given. Now Mr. Fowle, however much he may know about his "Peruvian Syrup," is of necessity utterly ignorant of the individuals to whom he so confidently recommends it. The folly of his treating, by a panacea, "dropsy, debility, humors, dyspepsia," &c., each of which diseases has a large variety of diverse causes, would seem to be apparent to the unprofessional. There is guessing enough, in all conscience, by the family physician, without the sick staking their health in a distant lottery with a man at the wheel whose sole object is to make money. The only point upon which purchasers can safely rely is that to the patentee the ingredients are cheap and the profits enormous. Beyond this, the best to be hoped for is that the compound will prove comparatively harmless—and superlatively impotent. If, on the other hand, it possesses an element of power, which by a remarkable coincidence of chances works one cure, in ninety and nine the same force misdirected does nothing but harm.

But the attempt to prove an axiom is the dislocation of logic.

The matter is plain enough to any one who does not take a view of the question through his pocket.

Now that the business manager of THE INDEX, Mr. Bateson, has sold out to a friend of the editor, there is no reason to doubt that the pristine symmetry of the two departments will be fully restored.

L. F. C. GARVIN, M. D.

LONSDALE, R. I.

[The above article was received before the Annual Meeting of the stockholders. It is sufficient to say now that hereafter no patent medicine advertisement will be admitted into THE INDEX; but that the contract for the insertion of advertisements already in it, including the one referred to by Dr. Garvin, will be respected. —E.D.]

ORTHODOXY AND THE INDIANS.

God (the Orthodox one) is virtually already in the Constitution, according to Secretary Delano, who defines the "Peace policy" to be, among other things, securing "the services of competent, upright, faithful, moral, and religious [Orthodox] agents;" "to establish schools, and through the instrumentality of Christian organizations acting in concert with the government, as far as possible to build churches and organize Sabbath schools whereby these savages may be taught."

Protestant church-members and their families are variously estimated at one-tenth to one-seventh the population; Catholics about one-eighth—say a fourth altogether; and three-fourths who are either indifferent or hostile are forced to pay for supporting and disseminating the dogmas of the one-fourth, not only among Indians, but everywhere.

And how about the competency of these "religious" agents? Gen. Sherman says they are "very good men, but lack force and power." That is, perhaps, putting it mild; he perhaps means that they are "very good" for nothing. "Good" with some people is a synonym for "religious;" if he were to say "very religious" men and consequently "good" for nothing as agents, perhaps he would hit it. That is more likely what he would say were his wife not a zealous Catholic.

When Gen. Howard wanted to interview Cachise, he had to employ as agent a man who had large experience of Indian character and was highly respected by Indians, but was not religious. He states that this appointment was the only exception to his practice of appointing only those recommended by religious denominations; yet this man was of more service than fifty such. Were religion as well as politics invariably ignored in appointing Indian agents, we should have fewer Indian wars. The Modoc war seems to be a clear case of mismanagement by an Indian agent.

Thus religionists not only draw on the public treasury to support their good-for-nothing zealots and build the churches, but saddle the community with the cost of wars resulting from the inefficiency of their nominees.

A. CRIDGE.

PROVIDENCE.

In the course of the narrative recounting the cruelties of that cruel tyrant, the first Frederick William, of Prussia, touching the case of Dorris Ritter, Mr. John S. C. Abbot, in his life of Frederick the Great, page 103, makes this reflection: "One's faith in a superintending Providence is almost staggered by such outrages. It would seem that there could scarcely be any compensation even in the future world for so foul a wrong inflicted on this guileless and innocent girl. There can be no possible solution of the mystery but in the decree, 'After death the judgment.'" There are yet few authors who dare to write bravely and truly, and keep their pages free from all traces of that sop to Cerberus which even the great Bacon, in more perilous times, was not ashamed to use. The language just quoted is a specimen of the cant which is part and parcel of the most popular publications of the day. It is intellectually and morally mischievous to a degree not generally appreciated. If Mr. Abbot may be excused for uttering it, can we, ought we, to overlook the demoralizing spirit of theological teaching which allows it to be widely circulated without challenge, and even with acceptance? That Frederick, who could not prevent the wrong, did in a certain sense owe Dorris Ritter "compensation" for it afterwards, all will agree; but the "judgment" relied on by the historian pertains to the same "superintending Providence" under which the cruel wrong was done. Surely that faith must be of the toughest which is only "staggered" in such a case. If Providence permitted the wrong, or rather caused it, by constituting Frederick William and his order, of which the wrong was an inevitable effect, how can we expect anything better in a future world, under the same superintendence? If Frederick William had repented of his injustice and made what reparation he could to its victim, we should rejoice in his change of heart, and commend his latter course while we continued to denounce and abhor his former; but as to Providence, we must suppose it to be equally good and adorable in the wrong done to the Prussian maiden and in the compensation for the wrong which faith carries to the account of a post mortem judgment. In other words, we are at liberty to call things by their right names when a man is in question; but we are required, at the dictate of religious sentiment, to stultify our reason and crucify our moral instincts when we find ourselves in the presence of the Idol of Christian faith and worship. "Providence" is as often invoked, we may fear, to sanctify the evil passions of men as to embody their love of right and aspirations for its triumph here and hereafter. To find fault with the order of Nature in itself is manifestly futile. It is by ascribing it, with all its relative disorders, to the Will of a Supreme Intelligence, that we provide a ground for something like reasonable complaint and lamentation. The human mind is so constituted that, accepting the theological postulate of an Absolute Personal Deity as the source of all things, it cannot help feeling the justice of the complaint; and this justice is proof against all the succeeding plea which theology offers. Let us acknowledge in all honesty that wrong is a blot on any "providence" under which it happens; and, preventing as far as we can, and after that repairing as far as we may, all the wrong within our reach, confess that we know nothing of any "compensation" that can change the nature of things, and cease to look on human destiny in the light of a commercial transaction.

ANCIENT RADICALISM.

In Buddha's Dhammapadam, or Path of Virtue, in verse No. 417, we read:—

"He who, after leaving all bondage to men, has risen above all bondage to the gods,—who is free from every bondage,—him I call indeed a Brahmana."

Also verse No. 420:—

"He whose way the gods do not know, nor spirits, nor men, and whose passions are extinct, him, the venerable,—I call indeed a Brahmana."

This old thinker recognized and appreciated the great necessity of freedom from moral and intellectual bondage, even to the gods.

Faithfulness and independence are the great duties.

Compare this splendid broad scale of thought with the current religious teachings of the day; with the creeds; with the cry of "Come to Jesus," because "in him ye have eternal life," and without him all else is of no avail!

SOCIETY FOR CONVERTING THE JEWS.—A high old society is that whose object is the "Conversion of the Jews to Christianity." The Society held a meeting on last Sunday night. Like the other kindred societies whose organization was for the purpose of supplying Digger Indians with fine-tooth combs and tracts, or for furnishing red-flannel rollers for the infants in the Sandwich Islands, and missionaries and Bibles for the dear papas and mamas of the infants (the missionaries to be eaten, and the Bibles to be used in lighting the fire that cooked the dear self-sacrificing missionary)—like these societies—some Rev. Mr. Chudband in the position of secretary, or treasurer, or some such office, always absorbing the greater part of the contributions, the financial workings of the "Society for the Conversion," &c., for the past year show that something over $4,000 have been expended; but where are the Christianized Jews? Echo answers: "There haven't been any converted!"—a feat on the part of the echo which, it must be admitted, required a violent effort; but the answer is true. We think we can furnish the Society with a Jew, at least one Jew, every year for $4,000; why mightn't the same Jew do for each annual meeting? No family—that is no Society for the Conversion, &c., should be without a Jew, especially on the annual meeting night, when the treasurer's report shows several thousand dollars expended, and, without the real bona fide Jew, nothing to show for the cash but a meagre number of "visits from inquiring Jews." $4,000 a year for answering the questions of "inquiring Jews" is good pay—a good deal better than our landlady (who, we rejoice to say, is slowly yielding to grace) receives for the same labor, and she sometimes answers several "inquiring Jews" a day. Probably the contributors to the "Society" will see, after a while, that $4,000 expended on the miserable outcasts of Bedford, Baker, Spafford, St. Mary's, and other such streets in this city, will doubtless produce a much more substantial result than answering "inquiring Jews."—Philadelphia Sunday Republic, April 13.

The Union Era is puzzled to understand the meaning of what it presents in the following language: "The names of the first Evangelical statesman, the first Evangelical merchant, and the first Evangelical preacher, in the land, have suddenly passed under a cloud. We do not know about the justice of the charges against them; we only know that reproach is heaped upon those hitherto considered entirely above it."

"The grief and humiliation of the Church at this aspersions of those whom it has loved and revered, and held up as examples, are painful in the extreme."

The Era says this cannot be passed by as a mere coincidence, but indicates "that God has some lesson in store for us." It suggests: "Have we put too much trust in man?" Other reflections present themselves to the Era, but it concludes that, whatever the lesson is, it should be learned before some heavier stroke is sent.—Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle.

A NORWEGIAN TALE.—A certain Norwegian hunter, who was one morning keeping watch in the forest, saw a fox cautiously making his approach toward the stump of an old tree. When sufficiently near, he took a high and determined jump on the top of it, and after looking round a while hopped to the ground again. After Reynard had repeated this knightly exercise several times, he went his way, but presently returned to the spot, bearing a pretty large and heavy piece of dry oak in his mouth; and thus burdened, and, as it would seem, for the purpose of testing his vaulting powers, he renewed his leaps on to the stump. After a time, however, and when he found that, weighted as he was, he could make the ascent with facility, he desisted from further efforts, dropped the piece of wood from his mouth, and coiling himself upon the top of the stump, remained motionless, as if dead. At the approach of evening an old sow and her progeny, five or six in number, issued from a neighboring thicket, and pursuing their usual track passed near to the stump in question. Two of her sucklings followed, somewhat behind the rest, and, just as they neared his ambush, Reynard, with the rapidity of thought, darted down from his perch upon one of them, and in the twinkling of an eye bore it in triumph to the fastness he had so cunningly prepared beforehand. Confounded at the shrieks of her offspring, the old sow returned in fury to the spot, and until late in the night made repeated desperate attempts to storm the murderer's stronghold; but the fox took the matter very coolly and devoured the pig under the nose of its mother.

We have just now seen a card printed for circulation by the pastor of one of the oldest Congregational churches in Central Massachusetts—a church which has long been blessed with the labors of the most cultivated ministers and men of the finest taste. These cards bear upon one face the appointed hours for Sabbath and weekly services, and invite general attendance; than which nothing could be more proper and worthy of imitation. On the reverse side, however, of the card, we were astonished to read the following topics of discourse in order for the Sabbaths of the current month: "Deformed Feet," "The Strange Contents of a Lost Trunk," "The Tragic History of a White Lie," "Frosted Locks," "Go to Jericho" (we can easily see, under this topic, how so admirable practical application of the subject might be made to the preacher), "Beautiful Shoes; their Prophetic Suggestiveness," "Salt Again."

And this is preaching the gospel in the year of our Lord 1873, and in the centre of Christian civilization! We are not at all surprised to learn, from a friend who heard him, that the preacher entered the pulpit with lavender kids upon his hands, which he only removed as he commenced his sermon. Neither are we surprised that the house is crowded.—Zion's Herald.

A writer in the New York Times, after a careful reading of Lamson's Life of Lincoln, makes the following deduction:—"Mr. Lincoln was an infidel—positive, absolute, thorough. He was entirely without religion; and not only without religion, but without any faith upon which religion of any kind could be founded. He believed in none of the doctrines, or even the facts, upon which the Christian religion rests. The man who was always the champion of the poor and the oppressed, who was ever ready for personal self-sacrifice, whose famous Gettysburg oration breathed the very essential spirit of the enthusiasm of humanity, had no faith at all in any divine revelation, none whatever in the Divinity of Jesus Christ, none, consequently, in the authority of his teachings."

If some of Mr. Lincoln's devout friends had known all this five years ago, they would have looked upon his tragic end in the light of a dispensation. After all, it seems that all the Christian virtues may be linked with unbelief and paganism, for undoubtedly Lincoln was a kind-hearted, generous, benevolent man.

A little Concord chap, who lived next door to Emerson, was engaged one day in digging a hole by the roadside. A worldly trifle passing by asked him, "What are you digging after, little boy?" With gravity he answered: "After the Infidel."

Niagara hackmen have raised their fares since Agassiz's prediction that the attractions there would dry up in a few centuries.

At a social gathering in this city, recently, a volume of the old blue-laws of Connecticut was exhibited, and its curiously-severe statutes examined and commented upon. Among other striking exemplifications of their absurd severity was a report of the actual punishment by fine of two persons for smiling on the "Lord's Day." Prof. Agassiz, who was present, contrasted the absurd notions of Sunday entertained by some persons in New England with his own experience in boyhood among the Calvinists of Switzerland. His own clergyman, after the religious services of the day, would occasionally sit down with his neighbors to what seemed to him a harmless game of cards. In the evening there was, not unfrequently, a dance at the house of the minister; and time after time, on a Sunday evening, the Professor danced with the wife or the daughter of his clergyman.—Boston Commonwealth.

Miss Kate Field is developing into a philosopher, or something of that sort. A recent article of hers in the New York Tribune opens thus: "It is a great mistake to have a passion for anything or anybody. Passion means downright earnestness; downright earnestness means no end of feeling; no end of feeling means expression; expression frequently means fighting; and when you roll up your sleeves and begin to fight, where are you? The indifferent world looks on in wonderment that any one should be fool enough to risk a broken head for naught in heaven or earth. If you are victorious, you are an enthusiast; and enthusiasm is a crime against society. If you are beaten, you deserve to be for startling people's nerves and making an idiot of yourself. I think that earnest people ought to be strangled in their cradles. Then there would be peace."

"It is a standing rule in my church," said one clergyman to another, "for the sexton to wake up any man that he may see asleep." "I think," returned the other, "that it would be much better for the sexton, whenever any man goes to sleep under your preaching, to wake you up."

At one of the ragged schools in Ireland, a clergyman asked the question: "What is holiness?" A pupil in dirty, tattered rags jumped up and said, "Plaze, yer riverence, it is to be clane inside."

TO THE PUBLIC.

The New York office of the Index Association is discontinued from this date. All business with the Association will be transacted through the Toledo office, at least for the present.

The Board of Directors of the Index Association, at their meeting of June 9, repeated the resolutions appointing Mr. A. K. Butts "advertising and special agent for THE INDEX," and awarding him commissions for services rendered. He is no longer authorized to act for the Association, or to represent it in any capacity; but under his advertising contract he will do business solely on his own account and on his own responsibility.

THE INSIDE HISTORY OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

By FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

This is a handsomely printed pamphlet of 54 pages, containing the full explanation of the recent "Index troubles" which was submitted to the stockholders of the Index Association at their Second Annual Meeting, June 7, 1873. It also hopes that every one who has read the statements of the other side will in fairness read this also. Price (postpaid), 35 cents. Address the Author, Toledo, Ohio.

NOTICE.

The following numbers of THE INDEX for 1873 can no longer be supplied on orders: Nos. 167 (March 8), 168 (March 22), 170 (March 29), 171 (April 5).

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1873, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE EMANCIPATION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burtleigh, Horace Swayer, Alexander Loon, and others. Price, 25 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and tollsome attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel. For it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debating character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

THE LITERARY WORLD, A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1873. It has been the aim of its conductor to make it an acceptable, vehicle of honest and trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers.

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorial, brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, says: "I have been a constant reader of this paper, the LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deference to its judgment in the purchase of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiment in this direction seems to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared."

The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

NOTES AND AN INTRODUCTION

BY PROF. T. F. MOSES,

OF YERKES OBSERVATORY.

1 volume, crown 8vo., $1.50.

"In this charming treatise, M. Emile Saigy gives a very lucid account of the latest mode of speculating on the Physical Facts of the Universe. It is a mode which may be described as bringing all the resources of modern science to the proof of the fact that the human mind is incapable of any intelligible conception of physical facts which does not resolve itself into matter and motion. There is in fact but one science under many names, and that science is mechanics. Atoms, and the laws which regulate their movements,—this is all our material universe." — Blackwood's Magazine.

Professor Max Mueller on Darwin's "Philosophy of Language."

[From the Liverpool Daily Post. Corrected by Prof. Muller for THE INDEX.]

The Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool having resolved to establish a Roscoe lecture of annual recurrence, the first of the series, which it is intended will be a permanent institution, was delivered last night in the small Concert-room, St. George's Hall. The lecturer was Professor Max Muller, and the subject of the lecture was Darwin's "Philosophy of Language." There was a large attendance of members and their friends, about one-half of the audience being ladies. The chair was occupied by Mr. A. J. Mott, president of the Society, and he was accompanied to the platform by a large number of the members of the Society.

The Chairman said his duty, as president of the Society, was a most agreeable one, in introducing to them Professor Max Muller. Professor Muller's name and writings were known wherever literature was studied, and it was highly gratifying to them that he should come that night, he believed for the first time, before a Liverpool audience, to deliver their first Roscoe lecture (applause). The Roscoe lectures had been founded by the Society, and had been named after William Roscoe, one of their earliest members, who for many successive years occupied the president's chair of the Society. When the foundation of the lectures had been determined upon, and when they had to consider what they should call them, it was felt that nothing could be more fitting than to give them the name of Roscoe, while, at the same time, they should be making the lectures a suitable, and, they hoped, a permanent memorial to the man who first made that name illustrious. It had not been sought to establish popular lectures in this case, or to address any but the best intellect in the town; but the object had been to give to members of the Society, and with them others who might desire it, an opportunity of hearing in Liverpool, once a year, an original discourse upon some subject of the highest interest in literature or philosophy, delivered by one of the most distinguished men of the day. These conditions would be fulfilled on the present occasion (applause). No subject could have a deeper interest than the great gift of speech; nor could they have chosen a more distinguished man to address them on that subject. They had come to hear Professor Muller, and not to speak themselves; and as Professor Muller knew more about human language than any one else, he should at once ask him to use it at his pleasure (applause).

Professor Muller, who was most cordially received, then proceeded with his lecture, and, in his preliminary observations, said:—

"Philosophy is not, as is sometimes said, a mere luxury; it is, under varying disguises, the daily bread of the whole world. Though the workers and speakers must always be few, those for whom they work and speak are many; and though the waves run highest in the centres of literary activity, the widening circles of philosophic thought reach in the end to the most distant shores. What is written in the study is soon preached from the pulpit, and discussed at the corners of the streets. There are materialists and idealists, positivists and mystics, evolutionists and specialisms, in the workshops as well as in the lecture-rooms; nay, the intellectual vigor and moral health of a nation depend no more on the established religion than on the dominant philosophy of the realm. No one who watches the state of the intellectual atmosphere of Europe at the present moment can fail to see that it is far more disturbed by philosophical than by theological questions, and that the Darwinian Creed, with all its consequences, affects the peace of our minds more deeply than the so-called Athanasian Creed. And how could it be otherwise? The vision of the world held by Darwin does not concern scientific interests only; it reaches to the very foundations of religion and morality, and it must become, to every man who can honestly reason out its consequences, a question of life and death, in the deepest sense of the word. Strongly as I disapprove of mixing up scientific with religious questions, strongly as I deprecate any attempt at raising theological prejudice against the progress of free inquiry, I cannot help feeling that it would be paying a sorry compliment to scientific research if, whatever its discoveries might be, it was never to be allowed to influence the deepest convictions of our soul. It makes a great difference to us whether we live in the atmosphere of Europe or of Africa; it makes the same difference whether we live in a century of Materialism or Idealism. In the great battle which has been going on since the first dawn of philosophy between Materialism and Idealism, the army fighting under the banner of Materialism is at present carrying everything before it. Materialism (I use the word in its widest but purely philosophic sense, not as a term of reproach) is everywhere in the ascendant; while Idealism has almost become a term of reproach. Far be it from me to envy Materialism its triumphs, or to make it responsible for the mischief it may cause. We do not blame thunder-storms in Nature, and we ought to know that neither the complaints of the moralist nor the threats of the theologian will avail anything against the tempestuous progress of materialistic thought. Nay, it is perfectly true that the human mind stands in need of such tempests, in order to gain freshness and vigor; and the idealist, however distressed at times, knows well enough that since the days of Plato his good ship has hitherto ridden out every gale."

The lecturer considered it a cause of real regret that so little attention is paid, in the controversies now carried on, to the history of philosophy. Even if it were too much to require a knowledge of the whole history of philosophy, no one ought to approach the problems of Materialism and Idealism who is not familiar at least with the works of Locke, Berkeley, Hume, and more particularly of Kant. Kant's position in philosophy was described more in detail, and his "criticism of Pure Reason" was said to stand in the onward stream of philosophy like the rocks of Niagara. Kant was neither materialist nor idealist; his chief object was to determine, once for all, the organs and limits of our knowledge. He showed that our knowledge cannot be accounted for by outward and inward sensations only, and that Locke's treatment of the mind as a tabula rasa, receiving and digesting impressions, we know not how, was pure metaphor. But even Locke admitted that the power of abstracting and forming general conceptions out of single impressions was peculiar to man, and "that it puts a perfect distinction betwixt man and brutes, being an excellency which the faculties of brutes do by no means attain to." Only one excuse could be imagined why Mr. Darwin and his followers should have disregarded the important conclusions arrived at on this point by former philosophers. They might say with some show of reason, "Why should we discuss the question of the constituent elements of the human mind? Why should we trouble ourselves whether Locke or Berkeley or Hume was right in his analysis of mental faculties? We possess evidence which they did not possess, and which renders all their lucubrations unnecessary. We know that animals derive their knowledge through their senses only; we know also that man is the lineal or lateral descendant of some lower animal; therefore, the human mind cannot be either more or less than a development of the animal mind."

The lecturer then proceeded to examine Mr. Darwin's remarks on language more in detail. He criticised the idea of development as opposed to all sound reasoning. He objected to the constant recurring hypothesis of insensible gradation which would carry us back to the philosophy of Herakleitos; and in answer to Mr. Darwin's assertion, that in a series of forms insensibly graduating from the same ape-like creature to man as he now is, it would be impossible to fix on any definite point where the term man ought to be used, he maintained that that point would be coincident with the Radical Period of language, with the first formation of general ideas embodied in the so-called roots of language. Different views of the origin of language were discussed, and it was shown that even those who believe in the bow-wow and pooh-pooh theories, in no way supported Mr. Darwin's view. Even if the materials of language were supplied by interjectional and imitative sounds, these materials would not account for language such as it is. One might say that the materials of the flints were found by thousands in the fields; but what we want to know is how flints came to have a shape and a purpose. To say that no traces of human workmanship can be discovered in these flints, or that there is no insuperable objection to the belief that they were fashioned by apes, would be absurd, but not half as absurd as to maintain that, the materials of language being given, everything else was a mere question of development, or might be the work of some ape-like creatures. In answer to Mr. Darwin and Archbishop Whateley, who ascribe language to animals as well as to man, Professor Max Muller entered fully on the distinction between emotional and rational language, claiming the former for men and animals, the latter for men only. Referring to the researches of M. Broca, Dr. Hughlings Jackson, Dr. Bateman, and others, he showed that the broad difference between these two modes of language was clearly indicated by the convolutions of the brain in their healthy and diseased state. Rational language is the work of reason, because every word in it is founded on an abstraction or general conception. Even such concrete words as stable, saddle, road, father, mother, are all in their origin abstract terms, and to believe with Mr. Darwin that there are savages who have no abstract terms, would be a mistake. All real words are derived from roots, and every root embodies a general or abstract conception. Stable comes from a root sta, to stand; saddle, from a root sad, to sit; father from a root pa, to protect; mother from a root ma, to fashion. This fact is the greatest discovery of the science of language. In that science the roots which remain as the constituent elements of all human speech are treated as ultimate facts, but in the science of thought they admit of a complete analysis.

The lecturer then gave an explanation of the origin of roots. "The imitation of the sounds," he said, "by which our own feelings manifest themselves and the imitation of the so-called sounds of Nature—for instance, the slinging of birds, the howling of the wind, the falling of a stone, the crying of a child, the laughing of a friend or a fiend—is by no means an easy group, and from the very beginning it must have given rise to an infinite variety of imitations, many of which it would be almost impossible to recognize without some other help. Not one of these imitations is to be taken for a root. How much these imitations vary we may see even in our own time and among civilized nations, when we watch, for instance, their different modes of expressing surprise or admiration. Martinez, in his Spanish Grammar, tells us that ah! and oh! express grief, joy, anger, and surprise. Cicero ascribes to the Italian interjection ah! and ah! more than twenty significations. The Chinese hu and fu express surprise; tsai, applause; i, misery; ai, contempt; uhu pain. The Frenchman, as an observant traveller has remarked, expresses surprise by ah! the Englishman by oh! the German by ih! The Frenchman says, Ah! c'est à merveilles; the Englishman, Oh! that is capital; the German, gottas ist ja priebtig. The divergence and uncertainty become still greater when we examine the way in which the sounds uttered by animals are imitated in different languages. I shall give a few specimens from Chinese only. What would you think to be the meaning of kiao-kiao? It is meant for the cry of the cock; kao-kao stands for the cry of the wild goose; siao-siao stands for the sound of wind and rain; lin-lin for the rolling of carriages; tsiang-tsiang for the sound of chains; kan-kan for the beating of drums, and so on. It would be easy to produce similar words from other languages in order to show, first, how difficult and fanciful all imitations of inarticulate by means of articulate sounds must be; secondly, how, after all, every one of these imitations can represent something very special only. One might imagine the possibility of a language consisting altogether of such imitative sounds; but, as a matter of fact, no tribe even of the lowest savages has been discovered employing no more than such utterances.

"The question, therefore, is, how does human language emerge from these purely animal, or at least half-animal, utterances? How, if we start from such imitations and interjections, as the incontestable materials of speech, can we ever arrive at the real elements of human languages—I mean the roots, the residue of our own scientific analysis? The question is not so difficult when we treat it in general; but it hardly admits of exact and scholar-like treatment when we approach it in detail. Interjections and imitations are the very opposite of roots; they are vague and varying in sound, but very special in meaning; while roots are very specific in sound, but general in their meaning. There is the problem which has to be solved, and it can be solved only by a constant reference to the psychological process by which single impressions are changed into more general or abstract forms of thought. As soon as a general conception arose in the human mind, as soon as only two single impressions were combined, the imitative sounds of the one or the other, so far from being helpful, become hurtful and impossible. I shall try to make this clear by a very simple case. As long as people thought of sheep as sheep, and of cows as cows, they might very well indicate the former by the imitative sound of baa, and the latter by the imitative sound of moo. But now suppose that for the first time the want was felt of speaking of a flock of sheep and cows, and you will see that neither baa nor moo would do. They would be the very sounds to be avoided. What was wanted was either a combination of the two or a compromise between the two. With the addition of every new element and every new imitative sound the difficulty became greater. It is easy enough to imitate the cries of the cuckoo and the cock, and the sounds "cuckoo" and "cock" might well be used as the phonetic signs of these two birds; but if a phonetic sign was required for the singing of more birds, or it may be of all possible birds, every imitation of a special note became useless, and nothing but a filing down of the sharp corners of these imitative sounds could answer the new purpose. This phonetic process of what I call despecializing runs exactly parallel with the process of the generalization of our impressions, and through this process alone we are able to understand how, after a long struggle, the uncertain imitations of special impressions became the definite representations of general conceptions. In this way the origin of roots becomes perfectly intelligible in its general character, but in detail it almost withdraws itself from scientific observation. In this chaotic process there is ample room for guessing, but it is almost impossible to prove anything, at least to the satisfaction of a scholar-like conscience. There may have been many imitations of the falling of rain, stones, trees, men; but in the root pat they are all combined: nothing is left in it to remind us of the sound of falling rain, rather than of falling stones, and thus only could this root become the sign of every possible kind of falling, giving us not only the Sanskrit patati, the Greek pip(e)tei, the Latin peto, but likewise the Latin impetus, the Greek potmos, what falls, accident, fate—nay, our own feather and pen. There may, nay, there must have been innumerable imitations of the sounds of breaking, crushing, crashing, smashing, gnashing, dashing, splashing, but in the end we find them all tuned down in the Aryan family to a very simple root, "mar," of which I have very fully treated in one of my lectures on the science of language.

"If we can thus understand the necessary process of the despecializing of imitative sounds, and the gradual elaboration of roots, we shall also see that roots of a more general meaning must have proved the most useful, must have been used most frequently, and must thus have supplanted parallel roots of a more special meaning. There were from the beginning different degrees of generality of meaning in these roots; not all reached the highest point, or the summum genus, but at times they became popular on account of their retaining a more special coloring. Again, in this struggle for generalization, many roots must have crossed each other, and the general meanings of going, moving, sounding, falling, must have been reached from very different starting-points. Thus we can understand how, though beginning with the same materials, families, villages, tribes, and races, would, after a very short separation, if it took place during the Radical Period, have become of necessity mutually unintelligible; so that the most different families of language could have sprung from one common source. From this point of view to deny the possibility of a common origin of language is simply absurd.

"Another question which has frequently been asked, namely, whether what are commonly called secondary and tertiary roots were derived from primary roots, or whether they are remnants of earlier stages in the development of language, does not admit of an equally conclusive answer. If we find three roots like sar, sarp, and sarg, expressive of different kinds of movement, we have a right to look upon the additional letters p and g as modificatory elements, and upon the roots formed by them as derived and secondary. This is particularly the case when these additional letters are used systematically—as, for instance, in forming causative, desiderative, inchoative, and intensive roots. But there are other cases where we must admit parallel roots representing to us independent attempts at fixing general conceptions. If one root was possible, other roots, too, were possible; very similar in sound and meaning, yet formed independently, and not simply derived. This mode of explaining existing varieties, not by genealogical succession but by collateral development, has of late been far too much neglected, not only in the science of language, but likewise in many branches of natural science.

"After what I have said, it will, I hope, have become clear to those who may have read my lectures on the science of language, that what I called roots, or phonetic types, are indeed the ultimate facts in our analysis of language, but that from a higher and philosophical point of view they admit of a perfectly intelligible explanation. They represent the nuclei formed in the chaos of interjectional and imitative sounds, the fixed centres which become settled in the vortex of natural selection. With these phonetic types, and not with the cries of animals, or the interjections of men, begins the history of rational as opposed to emotional language. Show me one root in the language of animals, and I shall say with Mr. Darwin that the faculty of articulate speech in itself does not offer any insuperable objection to the belief that man has been developed from some lower animal. One persuasive sentence from the throat of a nightingale, one gruff remonstrance from the snout of a gorilla, would be sufficient to convince me that they are men in the truest sense of the word. An eminent German professor, and he a Darwinian, declared that if a pig were to say, "I am a pig," it would, ipso facto, cease to be a pig. No doubt it would; but until it does, I hold to what I said twelve years ago in my lectures on the science of language—and I hold to it with a conviction strengthened only by the attacks that have been made upon it—that language is the true barrier between man and beast."

In the course of his lecture, which was listened to with earnest attention, Professor Müller was frequently applauded.

Dr. Nevins moved a vote of thanks to Professor Müller, and said it was a just source of congratulation to the Society that their course of Roscoe lectures had been inaugurated by one so interesting as that to which they had just listened. It was, he said, difficult to say whether its literary charms or philosophical feeling had been its most distinguishing feature (applause).

Mr. J. A. Pierson, in seconding the motion, said he was proud to find that the first lecture of the Roscoe series had fully answered and more than answered their highest expectations (hear, hear). He wished just to say a word as to the object they had in founding these lectures. They felt that in Liverpool there had been a great want of high class lectures (hear, hear). Of popular lectures they had had perhaps enough and more than enough: not that for one moment he wished to deprecate them, because he believed that whatever called the mind from the sordid concerns of the day, and led it to think, was an improvement to their minds, and a relaxation of their system, and deserved to be encouraged; but they felt there was something required beyond this, and it occurred to them, as the oldest literary society in the town, that it would be possible to establish a series of annual lectures, to which they should invite the highest minds in the country to instruct them in the subjects of the highest class which could engage their attention. He thought they would all feel that their course had been fully justified by what they had heard (hear, and applause). The subject which Professor Müller had treated was engaging the most intense consideration and anxiety, and the men who direct their minds in the proper course of thought, and could direct their minds to a satisfactory solution of this point, were rendering a noble service to their day and generation. Such, he believed, they were all agreed had been the case with the address they had just heard (applause). Professor Müller stood very high, perhaps at the summit of reputation, in regard to the particular class of subjects to which he had directed his attention. His reputation was not merely English, it was European; and perhaps many of them would know that since the rehabilitation of the University of Strasburg, he had been invited there, and had taken a very active part in the reorganization of that institution, and he believed strenuous efforts were being made to transfer his services from England to Germany. Professor Müller had a kind of divided nationality. He was a German by birth, yet his heart was in England. He had been domiciled in England many years, and had become so acclimatized and accustomed to England, that it would be very difficult to tell to which side his leanings were inclined. He (Mr. Pierson) was, however, happy to say that they would still retain his services in England, although he might occasionally pay a visit to the other side (applause).

The Chairman put the motion to the meeting, and it was carried by acclamation.

The proceedings then terminated.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

"Let us see where you are to sleep," said Miss Franklin to her brother, to prevent a possible resort from the red-bearded artist. So, Harry piloting the way, they descended a steep ladder, Frank Sabin bringing up the rear, and putting his tongue in his cheek and grimacing at the surprise awaiting "the gals."

"This is the place, is it?" said Esther, ruefully, when they arrived between decks. It was so indifferently lighted by the open hatchways, that, coming from the sunlight and air above, they seemed to be in total darkness. There were plenty of people astir in it, however, though they could hardly move for boxes.

"Take care! We shall soon see better." So saying, and avoiding the obstructions as far as possible, Harry Franklin led the way aft, and dexterously sliding back a small door made of unpainted, unplanned deal invited his companions to enter what appeared to be a dark, musty closet, fitted up with a couple of shelves, and blockaded by luggage. Owing to the size, or rather smallness, of this delectable apartment, only the two young ladies contrived to squeeze in after Harry; hence the rest of the party stopped outside, inserting their heads at the doorway for the purpose of joining in the conversation.

"Snug quarters, ain't they?" said Franklin, laughing. "We've the whole of this cabin to ourselves. Sleeping accommodation for three here, you see." He indicated the shelves, which were provided with a piece of timber at their outer extremities, to prevent the occupants of the "berths" from rolling out of them during the pitching of the vessel at sea. The place was as gloomy as a cellar, and smelt worse.

Ruth put her hand into the berths and felt the planks; they were rough and unplanned. "What a horrid—" she began; and then, suppressing her disparagement, courageously added, "I dare say it'll be quite pleasant at sea."

They all laughed at her change of tone, and valorous determination to make the best of it. "To be sure it will!" cried Paul. "Look, here's a window." And he pushed back a small, square piece of wood in the partition near the door; but as there was a cask close against it, very little light was admitted.

"You'll see capitally, when the things are stowed away and the stern ports are open," remarked Mr. Humphries. And "Of course!" echoed Purdy and Grayling. Esther Franklin didn't speak, but squeezed her brother's arm tightly within her own, and embraced the opportunity of the darkness and Ruth's turning to go out, to kiss him before following.

He thought she was going to cry, and said hurriedly: "Come, let us go on deck again. Paul and I have got lots of things to do—to see about beds and tin-ware, and what not; they're all here, but we must look after them. Perhaps Dick has come aboard by this time."

However, on regaining the sunlight they could nowhere espy the tall form of their missing friend. So, leaving the ladies under charge of Mills and the pupils (Frank had temporarily ab-

At the time this opinion was pronounced it was necessary to make sure that Paul and Mary were not running a similar risk, and, being dispatched to the "Cayuga," presently arrived with such an alarming account that

TRANSPLANTATION.

It is time to take the sprouting acorn out of the flower-pot, and plant it in the ground. THE INDEX ought now to be published in a great city, within reach of the thousand and one sources of nourishment which can be found nowhere else. It can live, but yet somewhat languishingly, in Toledo; it cannot grow to a strength commensurate with its objects except where strength is daily poured into it from the full reservoirs of the world. The increase of the subscription list, the general prosperity of its finances, and the improvement of the paper itself (on which everything else depends and without which all our labor is as water poured into a sieve), require its publication either in Boston or New York.

But the transplantation cannot, at least for some time, be accomplished without prompt and liberal aid. Within two months, at least, the change should be made, or the chief advantages of it will be lost for a year; but the change cannot wisely be attempted within that time, unless a generous sum is advanced in cash. This sum has been set by the Directors at $5,000 if Boston is selected, or $10,000 if New York is selected: the difference being made on account of estimated difference of expense. The friends of the paper need not anticipate a long series of appeals for help, after the present difficulty, for which we are not in the least responsible, has been surmounted; we shall then "cut the coat according to the cloth." But whoever really cares to throw his influence on the side of freedom and advancement in religious thought, life, and ideals, as represented by THE INDEX, should prove it now, if ever. Let each friend vote either for Boston or New York, and state just what he will give in case his favorite is elected! The voters will decide the case.

The Executive Committee, after obtaining the best legal advice, unanimously agree in the opinion that the publication of the paper in either place can be so provided for as to come wholly within the letter and the spirit of the Ohio statutes, by which the Index Association is governed. There is no reason for apprehending any difficulty on legal grounds. Then let our friends everywhere interest themselves in what must give a great stimulus to THE INDEX in every conceivable way, and thereby give added power to the ideas it stands for. This is the golden hour for action, and we wait to learn whether radicalism is wise and earnest enough yet to improve it.

MAX MÜLLER ON DARWINISM.

The attention of our more thoughtful readers is specially invited to the leading paper of this issue of THE INDEX, which is the report of a lecture recently delivered in Liverpool by Professor Max Müller on the application of the Darwinian theory to the explanation of the origin of language. The distinguished lecturer has favored us with a copy of this report carefully corrected by himself; and it is now republished in our columns with as great a degree of accuracy as the somewhat worn state of the copy renders possible.

The present lecture is apparently a condensation of three lectures delivered on March 22, March 29, and April 5, in the Royal Institution of Great Britain. Judging by the "Syllabus" for which we are also indebted to Professor Müller, these three lectures must have been of absorbing interest, containing as they did criticisms of Locke, Hume, Kant, Schopenhauer, Comte, Mill, Spencer, Darwin, Buchner, and Hæckel, and taking the general ground that the "descent of man," not being a purely anatomical question, must be studied also on the side of philology,—that language is the barrier between man and beast,—that the problem of the origin of language is the problem of the origin of human thought,—that cries correspond to sensations and lingual roots to conceptions,—that the results obtained by the study of paleontology, embryology, and comparative anatomy with regard to the beginnings of organic life must be supplemented by the results obtained by the study of ancient languages, growing dialects, and comparative philology with regard to the beginnings of language,—and that the theory of natural selection must be offset by the theory of "despecialization" and "phonetic types," by which the origin of roots and the origin of thought are indissolubly connected. The striking freshness and interest of such researches as these are no less apparent than the immensely important bearing they must have on the general question of the origin of man. Professor Müller is not a believer in the Darwinian theory; but no one would approve more heartily than Mr. Darwin, the chevalier Bayard of modern science, of the manner in which his great theory is controverted. There is no frivolous appeal to scriptural texts, no cowardly attempt to arouse the odium theologum, no reliance on anything save the spirit of science and the love of truth. This is as it should be. Although the general truth of the Darwinian theory appears to us to be established on an absolutely impregnable foundation, inasmuch as every opposing theory thus far propounded is obliged to rest ultimately on a basis of supernaturalism, we admit that the theory itself will undoubtedly be supplemented, and probably modified, by the gradual growth of human knowledge; and such services as Professor Müller is now rendering by independent investigations in his own special field cannot be overestimated. THE INDEX is a partisan in nothing, except so far as partisanship is implied in steady opposition to dogmatism and assumption under whatever disguise; and we therefore welcome Professor Müller's criticisms of Darwinism to these pages as heartily as we should welcome Mr. Darwin's own response to them.

But we regret that the readers of THE INDEX should be obliged to content themselves with this partial report of a mere condensation of the three lectures, instead of reading the lectures themselves in full. Who of them all will remain unconscious of chagrin, when we state that these three lectures were proffered to us by Professor Müller, in advance of their delivery, for publication in these pages; and that this most flattering offer, avowedly made to THE INDEX in preference to "Scribner or Harper's Magazine," was necessarily but most regretfully declined because it was received just after the outbreak of the recent troubles? Who of them all will fail to see the great value to the cause of free thought of a journal which thus suggests itself to one who ranks among the very first scholars of Europe, as the most suitable medium for the communication of his teachings to the world? Surely, when such a man as Max Müller can write—"I read the numbers of your IN-DEX with increasing interest," and seconds his words by an unsolicited offer such as the above, every American liberal should be eager to help sustain the paper, not merely as an organ of reform, but also as an honor to his native land.

In the preface to his "Introduction to the Science of Religion," which is soon to be published in London by the Longmans, and advance sheets of which have very kindly just been forwarded by Professor Müller, we find the following gratifying reference to articles published in these columns: "The literature of Comparative Theology is growing rapidly, particularly in America. The works of James F. Clarke, Samuel Johnson, O. B. Frothingham, the lectures of T. W. Higginson, W. C. Gannett, and J. W. Chadwick, the philosophical papers of F. E. Abbot, all show that the New World, in spite of all its pre-occupations, has not ceased to feel at one with the Old World; all bear witness of a deep conviction that the study of the ancient religions of mankind will not remain without momentous practical results. That study, I feel convinced, if carried on in a bold, but scholarly, careful, and reverent spirit, will remove many doubts and difficulties which are due entirely to the narrowness of our religious horizon; it will enlarge our sympathies, it will raise our thoughts above the small controversies of the day, and at no distant future evoke in the very heart of Christianity a fresh spirit and a new life."

Such indications as these show that a future of resplendent usefulness in the very noblest sphere of influence lies before THE INDEX, if the liberals of the land shall now seize the hour of opportunity. Our ambition stops short of nothing but to build up a paper which shall at the same time carry forward the mind of the age in the boldest lines of advance, and carry outward to the common people in all directions the results of this advance gained by the best intellects and purest souls,—stops short of nothing but to apply the enormous power of ideas to the moral and religious development of the American people and of the world, to promote the practical purification, elevation, and ennoblement of individual and national ideals, and to rouse to mighty energy those finer forces which are so profoundly needed to redeem the future of mankind from immersion in sheer brutishness and sordidness. This must be done, if at all, by thought. The means to achieve such an object by engaging the cooperation of the most powerful, cultivated, and intensely earnest minds of the age should be poured out like water. In such a cause it is a privilege to give and to work, to live and to die. All that we have to offer is pledged already; what we want now is what we lack—money. Who will step forward now with munificence in his heart and his hand, to endow THE INDEX with the power to realize its magnificent possibilities?

The Executive Committee cordially acknowledge the courtesy of Mr. Calvin Cone, of Toledo, in offering the use of Odeon Hall to the stockholders of the Index Association at their annual meeting on June 7, and also in declining to accept any compensation for the use of the same hall at the "Free Religious Meeting" of the following evening.

The legal penalty inflicted upon Miss Anthony for exercising her natural right to vote is one of those defeats out of which the victory of justice is at last organized. It is childish to blame the court for administering the law as it is, although the refusal of Judge Hunt, in a jury trial, to suffer the jury to render any other verdict than that which he himself arbitrarily ordained, looks to the unprofessional like a very high-handed proceeding. The friends of woman suffrage, however, will do wisely to waste no time in execrating the judge, but to use to the utmost this outrage upon natural justice in attacking the law which is the real criminal. The cases of Mrs. Bradwell and Miss Anthony show that nothing is to be hoped from the "constitutional argument," but that the battle will have to be fought out on the separate States by an appeal to public opinion. On the whole, this is well.

THE RALLY OF THE ENEMY.

The General Synod of the "Reformed Church" (just adjourned at New Brunswick, N. J.) has been considering the possibility of uniting the Calvinistic churches in America in a grand combination. The N. Y. Tribune reports the movement as follows:—

"Delegates have been heard from the North and South Presbyterian Churches, from the United and Reformed Presbyterians, and from the German Reformed Church, and the committee on correspondence has considered thoroughly the question of union and made a report which will go far to render Calvinistic consolidation certain next year. The report, after a thorough discussion of the subject, recommended the appointment of a committee of fifteen to take into consideration the whole subject of federal or organic union, meet committees from the other churches, &c., and report next year. All through the session, reports and speeches by visiting delegates and by members have strongly been in favor of union, and much gratification is expressed even by the old patriarchs of the church, at the submission of the various church autonomies to one denominational designation; since practically there is now but the slightest difference in form of government, while the doctrinal standards are alike in all. The Reformed Church has 481 churches, 205 clergy, 67,123 members, and has given $1,331,364 to the various purposes of the church—being an average of $20 per member, $16 of which goes to benevolence and $4 to congregational purposes. The North Presbyterian Church has nearly 5,000 churches, 475,000 members, and has given over $10,000,000 the past year. The South Presbyterian has over 1,500 churches, nearly 100,000 members, and has contributed over $1,000,000. The German Reformed has over 1,300 churches, nearly 130,000 members, and contributes annually nearly $75,000. The total strength of the United Church of the Future, or "The American Church of the Future," as the Synod committee call it, will be about 7,000 churches, 12,000 ministers, and 750,000 members. Certainly in promoting such a grand result as this the Synod now sitting has performed a great work."

What this movement portends nobody can doubt. If the design is ever carried out, the purpose of it will be frankly avowed; for Protestantism is seldom ashamed to show its hand. Some will honestly believe the end sought to be the restoration of Puritan piety to its old supremacy. But if piety is preserved in the separate churches, it is difficult to see how a combination of them all can be necessary to increase it. If it is not preserved in the separate churches, it is hard to understand how such combination is to create it. Piety must exist in advance of organization; and there must be a good deal of it if it expects to survive the crushing effects of organization. Organization means business, diplomacy, politics, scheming for power, arming for defence or aggression; and this is fatal to piety. We do not believe that a single man who advocates the union heartily thinks of the interests of piety in connection with it, except as an incidental concern. The promotion of "pure religion and undefiled" is not their object.

What, then, is their object? Is it the re-establishment of the Calvinistic theology, as a philosophical scheme, over the minds of men? Such an object could be more effectually gained by the devotion of a few powerful writers and speakers to the task of indoctrinating their generation in "Orthodox" views, than by the most skillful organization that can be contrived. If the Calvinistic theology has fallen into disfavor, the fault is due far more directly to the faint-heartedness of its teachers than to the laxity of denominational bonds. The combination proposed will have the effect to substitute machinery for mind, to put speculative matters out of the way, to prevent all discussion of abstract questions, and to bring brute force of will to the front. The theologians and scholars will play quite secondary parts in the performance. The wire-pullers and log-rollers will have the upper hand. If the names of those who have inaugurated this movement, and who mean to carry it through, were told over, it would be found to contain but few that are eminent for thought.

Brotherly feeling the object sought for? Brotherly feeling is a spontaneous, not a forced thing, as all know: it exists in all communities and neighborhoods. It cannot be arranged for: it is a sentiment, not a plot. The gathering together of two or three will generate more of it than a league of churches.

The projected union is a league, offensive and defensive, against Romanism on the one hand and Rationalism on the other. Should it be fairly accomplished, should it gain the sympathy and active coöperation of the "Orthodox" leaders, and carry the weight of opinion in the "Orthodox" community with it, we should see something which we pray that our eyes may never see in this country,—a deliberately concerted effort to bring civil and social life under the dominion of the Puritan spirit; to revive the Sabbath laws; to introduce theology into the Constitution of the government, and make this a "Protestant" country.

We are not sure that it would not be preferable to have it a Roman Catholic country; for a dogma associated with a church, harmful though it be, is less harmful than a dogma working alone by itself. What would England be if the "Evangelical dissenters" had the authority that is now held by the Establishment? It is the Establishment (as Matthew Arnold maintains) that secures intellectual liberty against the tyranny of theology. Church people are quiet, calm, composed; taken up with forms, ordinances, traditions, sentimentalities, the luxuries of faith. They are comparatively indifferent to doctrines. But "Evangelical" people are sharp, angular, aggressive, quarrelsome. Give them power, and they will make their neighbors feel it.

Our hope—yes, and our expectation—is that the scheme will be defeated; that sensible people, detecting the animus of it, will ventilate their suspicions; and that, when the plan comes up next year, it will be met with a storm of protest that will put an end to it. The only way to secure this desirable result is for those who perceive the danger to give notice of it. O. B. F.

The probable death of the Pope is contemplated with various emotions by different parties. A Catholic bishop recently remarked in the cars that he feared Pius Ninth would not be permitted by the king of Italy to have a successor. Such a prospect overwhelms us with consternation. Nobody on earth to be infallible! It is frightful. "May the gods send better things to the pious!"

The very interesting letters on "Unorthodox London," a few of which were republished in early numbers of THE INDEX, have been gathered into a volume by Tinsley Brothers, 18 Catherine Street, Strand, London. It contains sketches of Conway, Higginson, Martineau, Voysey, as well as Spurgeon, Cumming, Hall, Father Ignatius, and others who should be described less as "unorthodox" than as sporting a queer and eccentric Orthodoxy.

I fear I must dissent from one statement in the leading editorial of THE INDEX for June 7. I mean the statement that "Free Religion does not hesitate to take issue with dogmatic intuitionism. Its method is science." I should have dissented just as much had the statement been that the method of Free Religion was intuition and that it took issue with science. Ever since Mr. Abbot pointed out so clearly that the Free Religion movement really included two schools,—the Scientific and the Intuitionist,—it has seemed to me important so to construct our statements as to exclude neither.

T. W. H.

[I suppose Col. Higginson would "exclude" whatever is dogmatic and unscientific. That is all that I proposed to do.—A. W. S.]

While THE INDEX remains at the present reduced size, it would be unfair to subscribers to devote the requisite space to the article headed "Organize!" which was kept standing on our first page before the reduction. But no one should infer that we have any less interest or faith than at first in the plan of organizing Liberal Leagues. The contrary will be apparent. The secretary of every League formed (and many already exist which have never reported themselves) will confer a great favor by sending us without delay a list of the officers. To economize space, we use only initials in the place of first names, and omit all titles; and it should be understood that many of the officers are women—which is as it ought to be.

VACATIONS.

Annual vacations appear to have become an established institution with our American people, and for one I am heartily glad of it. I rejoice in this custom because I believe it to be in the interest of human nature and of natural religion.

Our American people, as a general thing, are over-worked,—many from necessity, and many more under the spur of an ambition which really does them very little credit. American nerves and energies are kept at a painful tension, because American life is under the high-pressure system which our business, political, and even religious customs so generally induce. We are a rapid people, and a hasty; we undertake large enterprises and drive them through to quick completion,—as a consequence often having to undo our work, suffering great loss perhaps through its slight and inadequate performance. We never let a chance to improve ourselves materially slip by, but keep the iron of opportunity red-hot with constant pounding. There is very little in the American temperament that is lazy or lethargic, but on the contrary much that is sanguine, nervous, enterprising, and excitable. The popular theory amongst us is that both wealth and religion are to be got by instantaneous conversion,—in the one case from indigence to fortune, and in the other from sinfulness to saintliness. The result is that we are satisfied with nothing that is not fast, that does not rush towards success both on the high-road to temporal and to eternal gain; the result is that, from September to June, we keep the fires of our energy and zeal roaring through all our countless enterprises to convert dollars and souls, and to secure splendid acquisitions here and hereafter.

And now what a blessing and a relief it is that this season of our annual vacations is to afford our people a little relaxation and rest from their labors; a little ceasing from secular and sectarian toil and competition; a little escaping from noisy streets, unclean alleys, crowded stores, stifling offices, hot work-shops, steaming kitchens, corrupt caucuses, fanatical conventions, excited prayer-meetings, and a fleeing to the green fields and beside the still waters of the calm country, an exodus down by the deep, cool sea, or up to the grand and peaceful mountains! How did our hurried and anxious American people ever consent to the fashion of vacations? The fashion—there's the secret of it! As a people we are no more slaves to ambition than to fashion. Vacations are now "the fashion," and so everybody has one. For once I bless "the fashion," and rejoice that all men follow it. It is an unspeakable gain to turn our people face about from scenes of drudgery, painful sacrifice, heated strifes, mercenary ambitions, political and ecclesiastical campaigns, and send them home to Nature, to look into her mild eye and be led by her gentle hand, to listen to her wise counsels that enjoin calmness of temper, sweetness of spirit, sincerity of purpose; to give them time to rest and re-possess themselves, and get better relations to what is right and what is true. I only wish that all who take vacations would enter upon them intelligently and wisely; that they would forget that vacations are "fashionable," and remember only that they are sensible, pleasant, and useful; that they would leave all style behind except that which is simple and tasteful,—every artifice also, and every ambition, all fret and worry, all haste and noise; everything, in short, that hinders the free, glad, natural play of body, mind, and spirit. Go home to Nature—dear old mother of us all!—penitent for wrong and folly, with confiding, simple hearts, souls sensitive to beauty and warm with love, minds reverent and aspiring!

Entered upon in this way, vacations cannot fail to greatly bless and improve all who are so fortunate as to have them. It is impossible for the frivolous, the vain, and the sordid to stand in the presence of the holy, mysterious mountains, to wander by day and dream by night within sound of the murmuring, infinite sea, without losing somewhat of their frivolity, vanity, and sordidness; without being suffused with a healthier glow of body and mind, gaining a deeper serenity of spirit, a higher, nobler aim and purpose. The beautiful country has influences to impart and lessons to teach to the unharmed and freed minds of men and women, which are a wholesome and needed corrective of the life of towns and cities. It woe from what distracts, excites, and irritates, and bathes in a healing calm and soothing restfulness.

Such an experience also promotes a better and purer religion. The religion of Nature of course is natural. The religion of cities is apt to be artificial and superficial. The Church is nervous and ambitious like the world. Each sect of it schemes and plots through three-quarters of the year to ensnare proselytes. The "saving of souls" is an enterprising business, carried on by tremendous ecclesiastical machinery, rushed through under the "revival" system. The air of the churches is hot and stifling, where breaths are drawn under intense excitement and passion; the atmosphere there is thick and murky, and through it men see the truth with obstructed and distorted vision. Now let the churches be emptied and closed—as they largely are at this season—and the members be poured out into the country, sent to school to Nature, wrested from sectarian wiles and machinations, left to worship unrestricted and free on the altars reared only by divine hands, made somewhat to forget the human distinction between days by perceiving that Nature's "holy time" is perpetual,—let all this occur, and what a gain is made for natural religion over ecclesiastical, which shall be not only temporary but somehow permanent! Surely, if the churches were wiser for their own interests, they would not suffer their members so long to escape from their mechanical drill to learn religion of Nature, but would keep their sheep and lambs folded and shepherded all the year round. Nature does not know an "infidel" from a "believer," but invites both to her board, and gives to each the same instruction and the same blessing.

I cannot forget those who are denied the benefit of a vacation—the very poor, the sick, the home-tied. For them the same weary round of toil, and pain, and care, to which this glad summer-time brings no cessation! God help them! Man pity them! Yet none knoweth how subtle, penetrating, and universal are the ministries of Nature: she forgets none of her children anywhere, at any time; and when they cannot go to her she comes to them bringing a boon in her hand. Somehow rest, pleasure, and relief shall visit these ever toiling, painful, care-burdened ones, in small measure, it may be, and yet perceptible. And unenvied the enjoyment, incomplete the happiness of all the more favored who remember not to do something for these less fortunate!

The Christian Union, in its prospectus for 1873, commits itself to "those interpretations of the Bible usually called Evangelical or Orthodox." Now Orthodoxy hinges on these its cardinal doctrines: The tri-personal Trinity, Total Depravity, Judicial Atonement, and the Eternal Punishment of the finally impenitent. We believe Mr. Beecher, its editor, is held in doubt on all these points by the evangelical brethren. Then the Union complacently announces James Freeman Clarke and Edward Everett Hale, two of the most pronounced and perhaps dogmatic Unitarians of the country, as contributors. Of course it has the precaution not to tell its readers they are Unitarians, while on the other hand it has the tact to say of its other religious contributors that one is a Methodist, another a Congregationalist, and so on. We do not mention these things because we have now any quarrel with the isms of any of these men, but simply that our readers may see how queer it looks, and what queer things men will do sometimes to further the cause of Christ, religion, and humanity. But business is business.

"O wad some power the giftie gie us

It is told of a certain well-known railroad constructor, that being desirous to push a certain work forward as fast as possible, he wished the laborers to work on Sunday. This they were not disposed to do, and sent a committee to wait on Don T.—and convince him of the inconvenience of his demand; but Don T.—would not be convinced, when the spokesman of the committee, becoming impatient, said: "Even the Lord rested Sunday." "Very true," was the reply; "but that was after he had finished his contract."

THAT TREE CUT DOWN AGAIN.

TITPECANOE CITY, June 13, 1873.

MR. EDITOR:—I am sorry Mr. Tucker refuses to buy my wheat at cost because he can buy of others for much less. Is Mr. Tucker quite sure that he is not buying for less than cost when he buys so cheaply? Would not that be theft? I know that some of my neighbors who raise wheat are becoming bankrupt. Take care, Mr. Tucker, that you don't "steal unconsciously." How is this matter of cost to be determined? Twenty men produce the same article, and very likely at twenty different amounts of cost. Which amount shall govern price? Do you say the medium price? But twenty other men produce the same article at a different medium price. Which medium shall govern? I think all must see that Mr. Tucker's mind is in the region of impracticabilities. At all events, until some definite rule can be given which is easily come at, the old rule of "supply and demand" will have to govern. Is not the tree of such logic as good as cut down?

TOO MUCH COOKERY:

The New York Evangelist has an item on "Jay Cooke and the Bankers," as follows:—

"During the war, while dealing so largely in government bonds, having a mail of hundreds of letters a day, most of them containing valuable remittances, this famous house resolved to respect the Sabbath. The post-office was not visited from Saturday night until Monday morning. Other banking houses received their mail on Sunday as usual. Jay Cooke refused to do this. Two millions of bonds and funds often remained in the post-office over Sunday. The rest of the Sabbath benefited all classes. Fewer mistakes were made in this house than in probably any other in the land. One hundred dollars would cover all the losses incurred in the mails by the house during its long connection with the government finances. Statistics show that in New York nearly every merchant who kept open his counting-house or did business on Sunday for the past thirty years, has failed."

Somebody has said that there are two sides to every story. Months ago I cut the other side of this story from another newspaper. This earlier statement, after dilating in a similar way upon the immense business of Jay Cooke & Co., concluded with the following significant language:—

"In this way, between the bonds and the banks, the health of fully one-half of the clerks in the house of Jay Cooke & Co. was destroyed, a large number died, and the banker ascribes his own preservation to his country honor, and an equitable, cheerful temper."

Here we have the old story of the luxurious, carriage-riding Christian trying to stop Sunday cars. If this country is to be saved from impending ruin, this must be partially accomplished by the conviction coming home to men of large financial ability that it is their duty to become financial missionaries for the salvation of their fellows. When we shall have able business men managing the finances of township, county, State, and the United States, because it is their duty to do so, and without money reward if they have already a competence, as Washington led our armies, or as St. Francis Xavier devoted himself to the heathen, we may hope for better times. But here is this banker, extolled to the skies for enticing from the people money that they should have given freely—and himself raking in millions in the operation—while he was making probably more money than any man in the country, yet working his poor slaves of clerks to death rather than employ a sufficient number. And then forsooth the Rev. Cream-cheeses of the religious press give him an additional pat because he preferred to enjoy his country home and his church nap and religio-financial meditation on Sunday, while his clerks were smothering in Philadelphia.

Every day one encounters soldiers, from major-general to private, who did a great needed work and really laid down their lives for the brethren, and are now living in poverty and obscurity. It was ever so. Said the Psalmist: "Men will praise thee when thou dost well to thyself!"

I believe in Sabbath observance, when possible, especially because in millions of cases the oppressed toiler is thus enabled to snatch one day in seven from his taskmaster; but let not this holiday be perverted to any false uses—not even to add to the glory of usurious bankers. As to the New York merchants, ninety per cent. of them fail whether they keep the Sabbath or not.

NEW ORGANIZATION.

CLEARFIELD, Pa., June 4, 1873.

Pursuant to notice, the friends of free thought met at their rooms in Clearfield, Pa., at 7 o'clock P. M. On motion of Geo. Thorne, Esq., Dr. A. T. Schryver was called to the chair, and H. Hoover elected secretary. By request of the president the secretary stated the object of the meeting. Messrs. Widenire, Schryver, Hoover, Vanscoyoc, Pentz, Kirk, and Kendall discussed the question of effective organization.

Mr. Thorne moved that a committee of three be appointed on permanent organization, and the president named Geo. Thorne, H. Hoover, and Samuel Widenire such committee.

On motion it was ordered that a copy of these minutes be sent to THE INDEX, Boston Investigator, and Banner of Light with a request for publication, that the patrons of these papers in Clearfield county and elsewhere may be informed of our action. After various discussions conducted with the best of feeling, the meeting adjourned to meet again Monday evening, Sept. 22, 1873.

TESTING PRAYER BY ITS FRUITS.

It would be strange if one man should invent a machine which he could not make work successfully, while afterward a host of men could be found capable of making that self-same machine work out the most desirable results. But something akin to this is sometimes found in the moral world. It has been the fortune of some men, in some happy moment of inspiration, to give birth to ideas of the value of which they themselves had no conception or appreciation. But the words spoken jarred the slumbering world. Men roused by the thought, hurried against it angry protests. The alarmed authors of the disturbing idea hastened to explain or retract; but too late, for the world was ringing with the new-born thought.

History is replete with instances of these facts. Mr. Tyndall may now be added to the list. No thought of modern times has so widely and profoundly stirred the human mind as that which demands proof of the alleged value of prayer. Mr. Tyndall—though wrongly—is the acknowledged champion who first throws this gauntlet to the world. The act is audacious. It disturbs the best-settled faith of all past ages. The deed rouses the scorn of the whole theological world. None take up the gauntlet, but many utter disparaging cries. And now comes Professor Tyndall with a modest explanation, which amounts to neither more nor less than a retraction. Tyndall and the Prayer-Gauge are henceforth divorced. He has washed his hands of the crime of suggesting that prayer might best show its benefits by being carefully and scientifically tested.

It is well he has done so. His original proposition was a bungling job. He could not have bidden the truth in a more uncomely shell. The idea of a hospital run by prayer was a conception unworthy of the truth sought to be elicited. Half the controversy that has arisen has been consumed in the management of that hospital. Now let Prof. Tyndall and his hospital go; but let not the theological world fancy the question put at rest.

A thousand champions now espouse the cause. The thought is born, and it will ring through all lands. It will not down. It will continue to vex the souls of those who, without proof, would have us believe in a God and a universe whose mightiest law is powerless before the magic words of an humble believer. Mr. Tyndall's abandonment of the field relieves it of a personality that only encumbers it. The issue will now stand on its naked merits. It is no longer a question between Mr. Tyndall and the theologians, but between the world of fact and the world of faith.

Strange it had never been thought of before; or, if thought of, that it had not been so uttered! But now that it is started, no power can stop its career. Ten thousand recantations cannot recall it. It will go into every household and sit sternly on every family altar. It will go into every church and sit unflinchingly in every pew. It will hold up its questioning hand before every pulpit, and trouble by its presence the mind of every minister who prays. For good or for evil, this test must come to all praying: What are its palpable fruits, when used to affect material things?

T. P. WILSON.

CLEVELAND, O.

[Must not the same test be applied to prayer for spiritual things?—ED.]

A Troy man is writing a biography of Methuselah. He has been engaged five years on the work, and has just reached the boyhood days of the patriarch. His description of the athletic sports of the young lad at the age of 120 is very entertaining.

A PLEA FOR CAPTAIN JACK.—A long editorial in the Star this afternoon, headed "On Behalf of Captain Jack," is thought to reflect the sentiment of the Indian Bureau; and the points contained in the editorial will be urged in Captain Jack's favor at his trial before the Military Commission, and also before the President, in case Captain Jack is sentenced to death. After reciting at length the history of the trouble between the Government and the Modocs, and the efforts on the part of the Government to remove and keep the Indians on a certain reservation, the writer charges that while the Commissioners were negotiating for the peaceful transfer of the Indians, propositions were being discussed for the arrest of Captain Jack and other chiefs, and to hold them at some remote point from their tribe until they should agree to have themselves transferred; and that General Canby indorsed these propositions, but admitted that such would be considered as a breach of faith on the part of the Department. In all his talks with the Indian Commissioners, Captain Jack maintained that he was guided by the advice of friends in Yreka, who advised him not to go on the reservation.

Superintendent Addendas, in a letter to the Indian department, dated December 23, says: "I have sufficient evidence to satisfy me that there are a few men in Yreka, Cal., some sixty miles from Lost River, who are to a great extent, if not entirely, responsible for the insubordination of Captain Jack's band and for the present trouble with them. There are several letters in existence which go to show that these men have persuaded them to remain off the reservation, making them believe they could claim land under the pre-emption law, if they would stay where they were, but if they went to the reservation they would lose all right to it. It is my experience that nine tenths of the troubles with the Indians of this superintendency is brought about by meddling white men giving them improper advice and dealing illicitly with them."

The editorial concludes as follows: "These data present these facts. First, that Captain Jack had good reason to apprehend treachery toward him by the white officials. Second, that he was secretly instigated to the course that brought him into collision with Government by these very white men of Yreka, who have, with interested bad faith, urged on the cry for the extermination of the Modocs and who, if the truth were told, very likely had a direct hand in the recent assassination of the Modoc prisoners. It appears that General Canby, as long ago as February 18, indorsed a plan for the seizure of Captain Jack and other leading Modocs, that he might admit the appearance of being a breach of faith on the part of the Government."

"Commissioner Applegate, while thinking the plan worthy of consideration, also conceded that their arrest would no doubt be regarded by the Indians as an act of treachery on our part, and might destroy their confidence in the Indian Department to a great extent. This fact, including the particulars of this treacherous plan for the seizure of the Modoc leaders by General Canby, was published by order of Congress as long ago as June last. It is more than probable Captain Jack was advised of it, and this knowledge may have had something to do with his own deed of treachery towards General Canby."

"Our respect for a brave and meritorious officer must not blind us to the fact, also, as has already been stated, that at the very time General Canby was negotiating under a flag of truce, he was bringing his men into position; and was, in short, violating one of the best known and most imperative rules of honorable warfare—that forbidding the pushing of military operations under the protection of a flag of truce."

It will thus be seen that while no palliation is afforded for Captain Jack's monstrous deeds, some cause can be given for them, short of pure treacherous "cussedness."

It is some satisfaction to be able to hold this amended opinion of a man who has shown so much of the old Roman style of bravery in action and dignified composure under defeat and impending ignominious death.—St. Louis Globe.

Daniel Webster was apt to over-indulge himself at public dinners, but managed, when called upon, to make a speech—if a brief one. On an occasion Webster finished up with: "Gentlemen, there's the national debt—it should be paid; yes, gentlemen, it should be paid. I'll pay it myself. How much is it?"

ORIENTAL KINGCRAFT.—A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette in the Levant writes: "I send you a couple of cases illustrating the ways of life out here. The late Sultan wishing to give the ladies of his harem an idea of the Crystal Palace, commissioned a firm of shipbuilders on the Thames to construct the iron framework of a huge dome-like structure. It was, when completed, put up in England, and then taken to pieces for conveyance to Constantinople, where it was re-erected and covered with glass, and formed one of the most conspicuous and pretty objects which met the traveler's gaze on going up the Bosphorus. The present Sultan, however, thought it interfered with his view, and ordered it to be demolished; and the debris of a building which from the first to last must have cost more than £100,000 has been sold for old scrap iron. The other story is still more strange. The Father of the Faithful sometime since ordered a new and gorgeous imperial residence to be built for himself. Art, money, and science were lavished on the structure, the sum total of the cost of which was almost fabulous. The day arrived when the Sultan was told that all was prepared for his reception in his new abode. His Majesty quitted his old and inconvenient palace with a light heart, and hastily repaired to the splendid and more modern one; but alas! whether his impatience or ardent got the better of his dignity is not related, but on crossing the threshold he stumbled and fell. The omen was of too serious a character to be lost on an Oriental mind. The Sultan retraced his steps, sent for the architect, and commanded that the gorgeous and magnificent edifice should be razed to the ground. The gentleman in question in despair repaired to the Grand Vizier, who failed to obtain a revocation of the order; but as a demerit remitted proceeded to the English ambassador, who at once pointed out to his Majesty how ridiculous such an act would make him appear before the civilized world. This, with other arguments, saved the place; but the evil eye is supposed still to rest on it, as it yet remains empty."

A nice little Missionary boy told his mother into her chair the other day because she refused to give him ten cents to put in the missionary box.

Swift said the reason a certain university was a learned place was that most persons took some learning there, and few brought any away with them; so it accumulated.

GENERAL NOTICE.

On Aug. 8, 1872, I contracted for the two best advertising pages of THE INDEX for the current year. "No advertisements objectionable to the editor to be taken." For terms apply to ANA K. BUTTS, 36 Bay St., New York.

No improper advertisements, no advertisements of patent medicines, and no advertisements known to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be hereafter admitted into THE INDEX. All advertisements accepted before this date will be allowed to run their time.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor. Toledo, O., June 21, 1873.

ARITHMETICAL CARDS & GAMES
Something entirely new. With them the drudgery of mental arithmetic is made a mere pastime; besides innumerable games can be played. Just the thing for Teachers and Pupils for instruction, and for everybody for amusement. Agents wanted everywhere. One pack, with book of instructions, sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. Address P. H. HATFSON, Proprietor, Drawer 10, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INSIDE HISTORY OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

By FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

This is a handsomely printed pamphlet of 51 pages, containing the full explanation of the recent "INDEX troubles" which was submitted to the stockholders of the Index Association at the stockholders of the Index Association at their Second Annual Meeting, June 7, 1873. It is hoped that every one who has read the statement of the other side will in fairness read this also. Price (postpaid), 25 cents. Address the Author, Toledo, Ohio.

NOTICE.

The following numbers of THE INDEX for 1873 can no longer be supplied on orders: Nos. 167 (March 8), 169 (March 22), 170 (March 29), 171 (April 5).

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FETTERABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. H. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY," together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Swann, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 25 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age,—a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toll-free attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs shot like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong, which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good minded, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address—

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHAILEN VOYER, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

THE LITERARY WORLD,

A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1878. It has been the aim of its conductor to make it an acceptable, vehicle of honest and trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers.

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorial, Brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, says: "I have been a constant reader of this paper, the LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deferring to its judgment in the purchase of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiments in this direction seem to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared."

The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

The Unity of Natural Phenomena.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE FORCES OF NATURE.

Being a popular explanation of the latest discoveries in the domain of Natural Science, including the "Correlation of Forces," "Mode of Motion," "Force of Gravity," and "Mutual Convertibility of the Forces of Nature."

From the French of EMILE SAIGUY.

WITH

NOTES AND AN INTRODUCTION

BY PROF. T. B. MORGAN,

OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

1 volume, crown 8vo. $1.50.

"In this charming treatise, M. Emile Saiguy gives a very full account of the latest mode of 'speculating on the Physical Facts of the Universe.' It is a mode which may be described as bringing all the resources of modern science to the proof of the fact that the human mind is incapable of any intelligible conception of physical facts which does not resolve itself into matter and motion. There is in fact but one science under many names, and that science is mechanics. Atoms, and the laws which regulate their movements,—this is all our material universe." — Blackwood's Magazine.

The Idea of God.

READ TO THE FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY OF TOLEDO, IN WHITTEN HALL, SEPT. 25, 1870.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

"Personality, with all its limitations, though far from exhibiting the absolute nature of God as he is, yet truer, grander, more elevating, more religious, than those barren, vague, meaningless abstractions in which men babble about nothing under the name of the Infinite. Personal, conscious existence, limited though it be, is yet the noblest of all existences of which man can dream, for it is that by which all existence is revealed to him; it is grander than the grandest object which man can know, for it is that which knows, not that which is known. 'Man,' says Pascal, 'is but a reed, the feeblest in Nature; but he is a reed that thinks. It needs not that the whole universe should arm itself to crush him,—a vapor, a drop of water, will suffice to destroy him. But should the universe crush him, man would yet be nobler than that which destroys him, for he knows that he dies; while of the advantage which the universe has over him, the universe knows nothing.'"
MANSEL, Limits of Religious Thought, p. 164.

The topic to which I ask your attention to-day is the grandest and the most difficult of all that can engage human thought,—I mean the IDEA OF GOD. It would be rash to expect that I could handle it without touching on the great metaphysical problems which in all ages have taxed the chief intellects of our race; nor do I expect it. Yet it will be my earnest endeavor to avoid as much as possible the terminology and subtle distinctions of metaphysics, and to say what I have to say in the simplest words and in the clearest manner. For the rest, I must ask your indulgence, believing that you would prefer me to speak to you thoughtfully, as to thoughtful persons, rather than to amuse you with flights of fancy or mere appeals to your sensibilities. These cheap displays are to be had elsewhere; but you and I are seeking for truth, and the search for truth is very earnest business. While attempting, therefore, to avoid all the technical phrases with which only students of philosophy are familiar, I shall not hesitate to ask you to think this afternoon.

First of all, let me guard at the outset against a misapprehension I am especially anxious to obviate. FREE RELIGION HAS NO DOGMATIC IDEA OF GOD. It leaves all men at perfect liberty to think for themselves, without undertaking to determine beforehand the results at which they shall arrive. It enjoins upon them the sober, untiring, fearless investigation of each and every subject that concerns mankind, in the spirit and the love of truth; but it does not presume to declare beforehand what the truth is. This pre-appointment of the goal which must terminate investigation is the chief characteristic of Dogmatism, the greatest enemy of Free Religion. The spirit of Free Religion is the spirit of Science, which knows nothing of dogmatic preconceptions or prejudgments; and in undertaking to give you the results of my own thinking on this great theme, let it be distinctly understood that I do so as an individual thinker only, not professing to speak for others, whose conclusions, however opposite to mine, will have a stronger claim to acceptance, provided they have a sounder basis in reason. If reason, properly applied to all the facts in the case, shall teach atheism rather than theism, and thus prove that the wise thinker will have no idea of God at all, I shall not shrink from this conclusion, but accept it as the final word of Free Religion on the subject. Obeying, however, the dictates of reason as faithfully as I can, I am conducted to a widely different conclusion; and this I now proceed to state.

Reversing the Bible doctrine that "God created man in his own image," Fichte, the great German philosopher, at the close of one of his lectures, is said to have made the startling announcement,—"To-morrow, gentlemen, we shall create God!" His meaning was that he should trace the origin of the Idea of God to the natural tendency of the mind to conceive him after the analogies of human nature. This tendency is very marked in most of the old mythologies, which represent the gods as merely men on a grander scale, exempt from death and endowed with vaster powers, but yet possessed of human form and human passions. The Jehovah of the Old Testament is as striking an instance of this tendency as any of the gods of Greece or Rome; and the Christian God of the New Testament is another instance of the same tendency, only less gross, and purified from the most revolting features of the localized Hebrew Jehovah. Calm and unbiassed reflection will not permit us to regard such conceptions as anything but superstitions; but neither will it permit us, in my opinion, to discard even these superstitions as absolutely valueless to philosophy. "We too often forget," says Herbert Spencer, in the opening chapter of his First Principles, "that not only is there 'a soul of goodness in things evil,' but, very generally also a soul of truth in things erroneous." So in this superstition of gods patterned after men, I am disposed to shun the contemptuousness of the superficial thinker, and look for the underlying truth of which even error itself is the perversion.

I think I can discern this underlying truth in the principle that there must be something in common between Nature and Man,—between the vast universe about us and our human consciousness. Here we are, thinking beings, moral beings; yet we are born, as it were, from the very womb of Nature herself. All the sources of our being, in all its forms and phases, are in her, and her alone; for I see no reason whatever to admit any distinction between Nature and an assumed Supernature. All the elements of our bodies are drawn from her; and I see no reason to doubt that all the elements of our mental and moral consciousness are equally drawn from her. The oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, and carbon,—the iron, lime, phosphorus, and other constituents of these physical frames,—manifestly belong to a universal system of which we are merely parts, organized in a peculiar manner. But these are no more elements of our being than are the thoughts, the feelings, the volitions which make up the never-ending stream of our consciousness. Whence did these come? Did they not come from Nature? Whoever should hold that these, the higher realities of our life, have no root in that universal system or cosmos whence all the atoms and molecules that compose our bodies are derived, must point out some other origin for them. It seems to me perfectly idle, I confess, to say that these phenomena of our consciousness come from the chemical elements of our bodies. Carbon cannot think; oxygen cannot feel; nitrogen has no conscience. How can the mere elements of our "protoplasm," which can do none of these things separately, do all of them when chemically combined? A new force manifests itself through their union, which is not a "property" of the elements themselves. Whoever refers the facts of our mental and spiritual consciousness to these elementary forms of matter, seems to me to adopt the most irrational theory that could be put into words. Finding, as I do, these facts in my own being, I can see no way to escape referring them to universal Nature, as I am obliged to refer to universal Nature all the various substances of my body. All that I am comes from Nature, that which enables me to say "I" included. In other words, finding the spiritual in myself, I cannot escape admitting the spiritual in Nature. If there is an escape from this conclusion, I want it pointed out to me.

Dropping, then, all the crude and coarse imagnations which appear in the pagan, Jewish, and Christian mythologies, I yet seem to see a truth underneath them all,—the truth that intelligence in man is not isolated or anomalous, but exists in Nature as well. Nature must be intelligent or she could not bring forth intelligent beings. The fountain cannot rise above its source. In this manner the very existence of Man as an intelligent being seems to prove that Nature herself is intelligent. Between Nature and Man there is something in common; and this must include all that there is in Man, unless Man owes his existence to a Being out of and above Nature. Paradoxical as it appears, therefore, it is materialism which, denying intelligence to Nature, is driven to the theory of a supernatural God. If there is no intelligence in Nature, our intelligence must come from outside of Nature; for here it is, and, not being self-created, it must come from somewhere. To me, therefore, MAN IS THE PROOF OF GOD IN NATURE.

But even waiving this argument entirely, I think that Nature herself is radiant with the light of thought. I lay no stress on the "argument from design," as it is called, which seeks to infer a designing mind from special adaptations of means to ends; as, for instance, the adaptation of the eye for the function of vision. The Darwinian principle of Natural Selection seems more and more capable of explaining all these special adaptations; and this fashion of proving God piecemeal is not to my taste. I am no friend to piecemeal philosophy. But the sublime unity of Nature, making her, in Humboldt's favorite phrase, a "living Whole," carries conviction to my own mind. The simple fact that, the more Science studies Nature, the more she brings apparent anomalies under universal laws, and thus makes the universe intelligible by intelligence, is to me the strongest of arguments for all-pervading Mind,—an argument which grows stronger and more convincing with every fresh discovery. The appeal to particular "design" is very precarious; mistakes are too easy to make, and too embarrassing when made. But this grand truth of the unity of the universe, growing more luminous and indubitable day by day, becomes an electric light to reveal its intelligible harmony. In this truth, the simplest and yet one of the latest to be grasped, I find a broad and substantial basis for the philosophical Idea of God.

Further, the modern demonstration of the "correlation of forces," which, all things considered, is the greatest discovery ever made by science, not excepting even the achievements of Copernicus and Galileo, Kepler and Newton, destroys that scientific polytheism which prates of plural causes. It proves that all forces are at bottom one, and thus establishes on an impregnable foundation the unity of Nature's cause.

Lastly, the Nebular Hypothesis, explaining the gradual evolution of the solar system from a diffused, chaotic, nebulous "fire-mist,"—the Development Theory, explaining the derivation of all existing species from a common origin,—and the records of historic and pre-historic man, explaining his gradual emergence from savagery, and proving his continuous advancement from lower to higher states,—these are all different aspects of a universal law of Progress, revealing the infinitely slow but infinitely beautiful unfolding of an intelligent and intelligible thought. How any mind can fail to be impressed with the convergent lines of these various facts, all pointing to a wonderful unity of plan in the history of the universe, I do not understand. Like the various indications of the plot of a well-constructed play, which a quick wit will seize upon and foretell the final catastrophe, they are, in my judgment, evidence of formative and artistic Mind.

Thus not only in Man as interpreted by consciousness, but also in Nature as interpreted by science, I recognize the presence of Thought, Mind, Intelligence. Of course I can only give the barest outline of the argument, and must omit a great many subsidiary considerations. My aim is to give the most in the smallest compass, and thus make possible a bird's eye view of the whole subject from my own standpoint. I find certain great facts all pointing in the same direction,—the fact of man's existence in Nature as a thinking and moral being, and also of the derivation of all his powers from Nature herself; the fact that Nature as a whole is a great harmonious system governed by universal laws; the fact that all the various forces acting in this system are mutually convertible and reducible in the last analysis to a single universal force; the fact that the Nebular Hypothesis, the Development Theory, and the moral education of the human race, appear to be parts of a comprehensive law of Progress, and thus manifest a great, intelligible plan in the evolution of the universe. Taken all together, these various facts point to a unity in Nature as a system, and in her history as a whole, which can find no rational explanation except in the activity of infinite intelligence throughout all space and time. In these facts, accordingly, I find the basis of the philosophical Idea of God.

The question between theism and atheism really turns on the points I have raised. No man at all acquainted with the results of modern science doubts that Nature is a coherent system of universal laws, or that it is permeated by a single universal force which appears under various convertible forms. The real question is whether this omnipresent force is intelligent or not,—whether the orderly system and phenomena of Nature are due to conscious Mind or unconscious Fate. I do not think that those who adopt the latter view have done justice to the fact of Man's existence. Man is clearly a part of universal Nature, and we find intelligence clearly manifested in his consciousness and his acts. It is not, then, an open question whether there is any intelligence in Nature; the only question is this,—Does all the intelligence in Nature manifest itself in Man? Is there no intelligence higher than his in all this boundless universe? Whoever denies a universal intelligence seems to me involved in greater difficulties than he who affirms it. For he is bound to explain how a thinking being like man can be evolved out of absolutely unthinking matter. Mind is an active, existent force in human life: how is this peculiar force to be accounted for? All that physical science can offer as an explanation is some theory of motion in material particles,—some undulation or vibration in nervous substances. It cannot get one step beyond molecular changes or re-arrangements in the great nerve-ganglia. But while admitting that these changes are the conditions of human thought, I deny absolutely that they even begin to explain human thought itself. Granting all that is claimed to have been proved concerning the "correlation of vital and physical forces," I find no light thrown upon the point at issue. The universal force which appears now as chemical affinity, now as heat, now as light, now as thought, and so forth, cannot be inferior to any of its own partial and transient manifestations; it must be higher than them all. Out of lead ore you cannot get a gold watch; out of physical forces you cannot get a thinking mind. So long as the mysterious energy of Nature which displays itself in such various ways is held to be absolutely unconscious and unintelligent, the simple existence of consciousness and intelligence in human beings must be forever the despair of science. But if the mind of man is held to be a still higher manifestation of the universal force than any physical phenomena, and to give us a still profounder glimpse into its true character, the anomaly disappears, and science will begin to study the facts of consciousness as affording the deepest insight into the heart of Nature.

This, then, is the essence of my Idea of God,—God is the one all-pervading Power or Force of universal Nature, manifested in all her shifting phenomena, and least inadequately in the phenomena of human consciousness. Instead of being inferior in grade to any of his own manifestations, he is as much superior to them all as the Infinite must transcend the finite,—not less, but immeasurably more, than the utmost that Nature reveals to our imperfect faculties.

The question, I dare say, has long before this occurred to your minds,—"Do you regard God as a Person? Is he a Personal God?" I will answer this question as frankly as I can. But I am always puzzled how to answer it without being misunderstood. I should say yes to one man, and no to another, according to what I believed he meant by the word person. Let me explain.

If you include under the idea of personality any conception of form or feature or visible aspect,—anything, in short, that can be an object to the sensuous imagination,—I should reply at once that my Idea of God is not that of a Person. This notion of him is essentially idolatrous. It is not by the imagination, but by the higher faculty of pure reason, that a worthy Idea of God can be attained. In the sense, therefore, in which I suppose a very large number of people understand the word person, I do not believe in a Personal God.

Further, if under this word you include any of the imperfections or limitations of the human mind,—any of the peculiar conditions of a finite consciousness which is subject to a process of gradual development,—I should again reply that I do not regard God as a Person. All such characteristics are as inconsistent with my idea of him as are the still grosser limitations of visible shape and feature. Freedom from all that implies finitude or limitation of any kind is an essential part of a worthy idea of God. But if by the word person you mean simply intelligent, conscious being, without regard either to limitation or illimitation, then I should answer that God is Personal. Not a Person, for this would imply a class of persons of which he would be simply one; whereas I do not regard him as personal in altogether the same sense in which we are persons. My thought would be better expressed, perhaps, by saying that God is not less, but infinitely more than personal. It is no rhetorical personification to say to him—"O Thou!" Nor are the words breathed into unresponsive vacuity. Although we are a part of Nature, I believe in a Universal Consciousness by which we are included, yet from which we are distinct. Just as we exist in infinite space, enclosing, as it were, a part of it in the limits of our bodies, and yet not thereby at all limiting the infinitude of space itself, so I believe our finite personal natures are included in the infinite personality of God, without either limiting it or being absorbed by it. Only in the feeblest manner, it is true, can we apprehend a personality so unlike our own. Yet there is still enough in common between us and him, to make it less an error to call him personal in this large sense, than to deny him all personality. I think I can make my meaning plain by an illustration. Between man and the lower orders of animate life, if the Development Theory be true, there can be only a difference of degree, not of kind. If we are persons, so are the brutes in a lower sense. The same faculties, I believe, exist in them also in a lower form. Yet this difference of degree does not destroy the identity of kind; and an animal would have no reason for denying man to be a person, simply because the order of his personality is so much higher. The analogy is imperfect, I am aware; yet it may illustrate my thought. God is personal in an infinitely higher sense than we; his consciousness must possess attributes and modes utterly unsuspected and inconceivable by man. Spinoza expressed this thought, when he taught that the two known attributes of God, extension and thought, were only two out of an infinite number of attributes, the rest being beyond all human apprehension. In the poverty of human language, therefore, and its powerlessness to express what transcends our actual experience, I must regard God as not less, but infinitely more than Person. Whatever else he is, there must be in him that to which our moral and intellectual and affectional nature corresponds, and which it feebly shadows forth. Modes of being as much higher than thought or will or love as these are higher than the insensate existence of the stone, doubtless appertain to God; yet these human powers must be, not reversed or extinguished, but infinitely realized in him. I cannot think it a mere figure of speech to call him intelligent, conscious, moral, personal.

Born out of a fathomless mystery, surrounded and engulfed in mystery all our days, returning to a mystery like that from whence we came, the thought of God is a flash of light in thick darkness. The mystery of Nature is not evaded by atheism, which only shuts its eyes to what theism very dimly sees. In the silence of lonely thought, in the hard experiences of life, it is to some of us a renewal of strength to feel, though we cannot see, a Presence pervading all things, and sharing the innermost life of our own being. Nature is no stepmother to her children. Whispers and hints of the love she bears us reach us we scarce know how. Dreams and visions of the poet, true to the soul as are the rigorous demonstrations of science to the intellect, awaken a consciousness of the unity between our own narrow, restricted life and the Universal Life that knows no bound. Well did the ancients speak of the Earth as "mother." "Father and Mother"—thus Theodore Parker delighted to address God. Imperfect and incomplete as all such titles are,—nay, worthless as are all titles for him,—they do nevertheless suggest a oneness between the human heart and the heart of Nature which becomes music and inspiration in every poetic soul. It sings of a love that is feebly shadowed forth by human ties,—of a peace that transcends our human dreams,—of a holiness that cannot be measured by human standards,—of a wisdom that cannot be sounded by human plumb-lines. Science can never disprove this melody to one that once has heard it; and she will never seriously undertake so fruitless a task. I care nothing for the name,—you may call it Nature or God or what you please; but there is in the higher and finer expressions of human life a consciousness so profound of oneness with the One and All, that it becomes the supreme, the sacred fact. It is the study of this internal yet most real of all realities that gives origin to the Idea of God; and perish what may from the mind of man, I believe that this idea of a Universal Unity reflected in the human consciousness, and explaining, illumining, and vivifying it, will endure as long as man himself.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XXII.—(Concluded.)

But Dick had reached the place where the girls stood waiting their approach, apprehensive, but unsuspecting. "Come to say good-by!" he remarked; and Esther held out her hand to welcome her cousin. She had begun to do so in words, when his manner betrayed his inebriety—the girl was acquainted with the symptoms from occasional experience in her father. Yet she put the best face upon it possible, nor shrank when Sabin bent over and kissed her; merely uttering an "Oh, Richard!" in remonstrance against the publicity of the salute.

"One doesn't stop when in so fair a road," he muttered, translating a French proverb, and approaching Ruth with the same intention. But she recoiled from his handsome, inflamed countenance, with such a look of disgust and indignation and contempt that it momentarily sobered him, bringing back his self-consciousness in a sharp, sudden pang of shame and grief and humiliation, inasmuch that it needed not the restraining hand of Mr. Humphries upon his shoulder to induce the abandonment of his purpose. In that one instant, he felt as if he had loved Ruth with all his heart—and that she deservedly loathed him. He drew back, though without a word of apology. There would have ensued the awkwardest of pauses, but for the cabman who had followed the young men, and thought the present an eligible opportunity for the renewal of his demands. On him Sabin turned at once, savagely; when Mops foreseeing a brawl, and determined to prevent it, again interfered.

"Get out of this, number two hundred and nothing!" he cried imperatively. "I'm your fare—at least, part of it—and responsible for the damage if there is any, which I don't believe. The keb, as you call it, must carry us home. Look sharp and do it, for if these ladies are not tired of standing in the rain, I am, and no mistake! Dick, old fellow, good-by! Make way there, will you?"

And the ready-witted artist linked the girls' arms in his own and pushed briskly through the group of idlers which had been attracted around them in the hope of further bounty from Sabin, or the expectation of a row. The grumbling cabman mounting his box, they began to disperse.

"Hadu't you better go with him?" urged the practical Esther, in her anxiety for her cousin, who remained standing on the spot where he had addressed them—it was too dark to see his face now.

Mr. Humphries ordered the cabman to drive on quickly, and pulled up the blinds of the vehicle. "He's quite able to take care of himself," he said, curtly; "and would rather be without company just now." And the jolting of the cab and the dashing of the rain against its windows put a stop to further conversation. Ruth was too indignant to cry, but in the shelter of the friendly darkness Esther's tears flowed freely. She had never before felt so desolate.

CHAPTER XXIII.

EPISTOLARY AND MARITIME.

ASTOR HOUSE, NEW YORK,

United States of America,

May 9, 1856.

MY DEAR AND DISTANT KATE:—

I will not tell you of the pain it cost me to leave England without the last sad privilege of parting with her whom I love most in the world. But you wished it to be so, and I obeyed; though I don't think you would have had the heart to persist, if you had known what you inflicted. Perhaps, however, you were right, after all, and it was best for both of us; for what could have resulted from such an interview but misery? Before now I am sure that you would have been sorry, if I had yielded to your request and abandoned my intention of going to America. That was, of course, out of the question; but I cherish the precious, darling letter in which you begged me to remain, and told me how the thoughts of my departure nearly drove you distracted—how you couldn't bear it, and would be everything I wished if I only stayed. I take the paper and kiss it now! O Kate! why wasn't it always so? At first, however, it made me very miserable. Then I hardly knew what to do, and if you had come out that night to our old place of meeting—. But I waited and waited and waited, all in vain. You never thought, I'll warrant, when you climbed upstairs to bed, who was watching outside in the cold and darkness; and who, when he saw your candle go out, felt as if hope were extinguished likewise—who then breathed a blessing and farewell, and departed. It was hard to have to go away so—hard not to be able to call at the dear, old familiar house and say good-by and God bless you! to anybody. But it wasn't to be, and here I am, three thousand miles away from you and old England, up four pairs of stairs, in a big Broadway hotel, situated in the very centre of life and bustle of the busiest city in the New World. My acquaintance with it is just two days old. How long, I wonder, will it be before I return to claim her to whom I am now writing, as mine own dear wife?—in which hope alone I am resigned to my present banishment. Could I only feel sure of that most blessed consummation, how patiently would I endure all that fate has in store for me!

But you'll want to know all about the voyage. I dare say there are plenty of more amusing accounts of crossing the Atlantic than mine will be; still here goes for at least a comprehensive and faithful narration.

My note, written off Deal, told you how brother Dick came aboard at early morning, just as we were starting. By the way, I forgot to mention that he distinguished himself, by saving the life of a woman who had quarrelled with her husband and jumped into the Thames, whence she was dragged by Richard, almost by the hair of her head, into the boat which brought him alongside. She had been tipsy and dancing overnight, in the steerage. They are a queer couple, and I may have more to say of them presently. All that day we were being towed down the river, getting no farther than Gravesend, where, next morning, there occurred a great overhauling of papers and passengers; and a poor wretch of a "stowaway," who had secreted himself in the hold, was sent ashore after the mate had sworn at him as much as he thought proper. (He was a great brute, this mate, and I subjoin his portrait: the whiskers are not exaggerated. He told stories about punishing such persons for attempting to secure a free passage, by taking 'em to within sight of New York, working 'em hard all the way, and then putting 'em aboard an outward-bound vessel for the return to their own country.) Two days we lay becalmed between Deal and Dover, in sight of the French coast; when the opportunity of sending you a few more last words presented itself, to be as eagerly embraced as—well, as the dear recipient would have been, if accessible. Harry wrote, too, to his kind sister; but Dick said he had nothing to say to anybody, and preferred loafing—you know his way. Then I wasn't aware of an odd circumstance which caused us a good deal of surprise afterwards. This was that the boatman, who took charge of my note, brought somebody aboard, who, paying a first-class fare, went immediately to his cabin, where he stayed until we had quite got out to sea; when, one morning, I met him face to face and recognized—Maberley! He had shaved off his whiskers, had his hair cut, and wore a false moustache; but I knew him directly, as he did me, for he turned quite pale—actually livid—and then dodged on one side, with a wretched pretence of not recognizing me. We are sure that he has been doing something villainous, and is flying from justice. Dick thinks it may only be from his creditors, but I suspect worse; and the idea made me very uncomfortable. He was passing under a false name, too—the aristocratic one of Captain Hawksley Rivers—and pretended to belong to the army. We didn't think ourselves obliged to keep his secret, and so it got about among the passengers, and everybody avoided and distrusted him; the captain saying that he wouldn't have taken him aboard if he had only known, though the mate—just out of opposition—made light of our story, on the genial grounds that nearly every European who came to America was a criminal of some kind or another, and that if he (Maberley) was a little worse than usual, it didn't much matter. So he was the only man that would take his cigars and drink with him: though, for the most part, he kept his cabin and pretended to be ill; indeed, I believe he was seasick the best part of the time, and served him right, too. There's only one thing that bothers us—his selection of a sailing-vessel instead of a steamer for the purpose of escape; but we put that down to his cunning or necessity. For we make no doubt as to his guilt, and fully expected that when we arrived at New York there'd be a couple of detectives in waiting for him, and that we should have the pleasure of seeing him walked off between them, with a pair of handcuffs on his wrist; in which, however, we were disappointed, for he sneaked away unmolested. I am very curious to know what he has been up to, and only hope it isn't murdering my poor aunt: in which case she is well rid of him.

You would have been amused if you could have taken a peep, between decks, at us, as the "Cayuga" went rolling and pitching and plunging and staggering down the channel, in very bad weather, with the wind dead ahead, a heavy sea on, the ports and hatchways closed, and all three of us lying in our berths, because it was too wet to be on deck and we couldn't keep our legs anywhere. Fancy me clinging to a kind of big bung-hole (apparently cut for the purpose of admitting an abominable smell of bilge-water from the hold), so that I mayn't come into violent collision with poor Harry, who shares my berth and is fearfully seasick, and of course hates to be spoken to. Imagine Dick overboard, making a St. Andrew's cross of himself to avoid being pitched head-first out of his berth—growing at the weather, laughing at the awful noises proceeding from the throats of four particularly wretched Germans in the next compartment, or trying to read by the light of a lantern, which, in conjunction with a ham, a rope of onions, a bunch of candles, and other trifles in the way of provisions for the voyage, wops to and fro, with great regularity, in his immediate vicinity. Then throw in the howling of the gale, the rush and swirl of the waters, the whack of heavy seas against the side of the vessel, the groaning and straining and creaking of the planks, the crashing, smashing, and dashing together of pendulous tin-ware and crockery, the tramping of feet and hoarsely-shouted orders overhead, the rolling about of heavy barrels which have got loose from their lashings outside our cabin and are pounding everything that comes in contact with them, and the indescribable sounds produced by a seasick steerage,—and you may form some idea of our condition. For the first fortnight the wind and rain had it all their own way; there was no going on deck under penalty of being drenched, and when we turned in at night our damp sheets afforded a lively suggestion of the water-cure. Dick said he shouldn't have been surprised at finding tadpoles in his boots, or a growth of toadstools under his pillow. However we took no colds, and made the best of things, and presently they began to get more agreeable.

For instance, there can be few pleasures, I imagine, more complete and delightful than being at sea in fine weather—to one with a happily constituted stomach. (I wasn't sea-sick at all—Dick very little; but poor Harry had it for all three of us!) The sun shines, the wind makes the great sails belly out overhead, the waves leap and sparkle and tumble, and everything is so fresh and bright and exhilarating that it amounts to a new sensation. You exult in the knowledge that you are, so to speak, a part of the strong ship that is triumphantly winning her way over the multitudinous, eternal ocean. Now her bowsprit dips, low—lower yet—till the line of the horizon rises like a great dark wall against the encircling sky; now we go up, up, up,—till it sinks far below us and we are boring away at vacancy; sometimes suddenly, offered with a regular, laboring motion to which you get so accustomed that it becomes a sort of lullaby, set to any mood you may happen to be in. I used to lie, thus rocked, for hours together, thinking about the sea, and Columbus, and of vast, submerged, primeval continents, the mountains and peaks of which now dot our globe with islands; of Tritons and Nereids;—

"Of that sea-snake, prodigious curled, Whose coil embraces half the world;"

and of the watery horrors described in that wonderful canto of Spenser with which I once sent you to sleep,—oblivious of everything but such fancies and present happiness. There was, as Dick said, a blessed sense of freedom from all shore-going responsibilities, which constituted the perfection of loafing. Then we had such appetites, and were always ready for our meals—cooked by the rather dirty darkey, who prepared the food for the cabin passengers. I don't think we should have stood much chance in the caboose, among those of the steerage.

After all, though, there is not much to be seen at sea; the prospect is so monotonous that the horizon appears contracted—you are always sailing over the top of a very full basin. Everything is an event, of course: a distant vessel, a great fish, or a shoal of porpoises wallowing over in the trough of the sea, like marine pigs—which is, I believe, something like the true etymology; or the wild sea-birds that rise and fall in our wake with a motion that seems imitated from that of the waves, and set one thinking of the albatross and the Ancient Mariner. I had great pleasure in looking at them; they seemed so tameless, so utterly out of sympathy with humanity. One—a great, strange-looking bird, with a wild cry of its own—came aboard one night and perched on the anchor, and flew screaming away when the sailors tried to catch it. We never got tired, and hardly wished the voyage shorter, except in calms or during wet weather. The former are always very aggravating. The ship lies jerking from side to side, the sails flap impotently overhead, doors slam, and the cordage frays and chafes like folks' tempers—for sailors hate a calm, and passengers are naturally impatient of useless delay. And I noticed that whatever quarrelling and fighting occurred on board happened in wet weather or on Sundays—when people were deprived of their ordinary means of amusing themselves.

READER!

Mark! on this side you have DEATH! DAMNATION! SATAN! And on this side you find LIFE! SALVATION! GOD!

Along which of these roads are you hastening? For in one or the other you most certainly are. Are you in the way to God and HEAVEN, or SATAN and HELL? A mistake, if continued to the end, will be fatal. "For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Mark viii. 36.) Jesus Christ says: "I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh to the Father but by Me." (John xiv. 6.) "He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life." (John vi. 47.) "Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out." (John vi. 37.) "I come not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." (Mark i. 15.) "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Luke xix. 10.)

A radical book just published in London with the curt title "Roots" has this acute remark: "My young friend had a theory that no man could appreciate a fault in his neighbor that he did not to a certain degree possess in himself." The Athenaeum critic compliments "my young friend's" powers of observation. Perhaps, however, the remark is not so deep as it is acute. If humanity is the same in all men, the germs of every virtue and of every vice exist in everybody; and in almost everybody they will contrive to attain a certain degree of development. Hence nothing could be more natural than to assume at once, without any special "powers of observation," that self-knowledge must be the basis of all knowledge of other people; and that he who justly appreciates the faults of others must do it because, in Scripture phrase, he is "tempted in all points" like them. But the knowledge requisite to a just judgment of others may be gained by temptations that are resisted, quite as thoroughly as by temptations that are yielded to.

Capt. Maxse's lecture on the Causes of Social Revolt (Longmans, 1872) is full of information, wise and temperate thinking, and sentiments that do the highest honor to the writer as a man. Take, for instance, the following passage: "Ignorance in the upper and middle classes of the literature and opinions of the working classes I place as a prime cause of social revolt. It is a more dangerous form of ignorance than any ignorance on the part of the latter, because the ignorance is associated with power. I often think that a little compulsory education among the governing classes upon what is called the Social Question would exercise a most beneficial effect." Do we need go farther than to "ignorance associated with power," in order to discover the root of social misery and oppression? It matters little whether the power is in few or in many hands; in either case knowledge is a necessity to happiness and prosperity in the community. On this fact rests the argument for compulsory or universal education, which is as indispensable to the preservation of the freedom we possess as it is to the acquisition of the freedom we need. The lesson is as good for America as for England; Captain Maxse teaches what two hemispheres ought most sedulously to learn.

THE BROOKLYN SCANDAL.

Some of our friends have expressed wonder, if not displeasure, that we have said nothing concerning Mr. Beecher and his accusers; and especially that we have not vigorously espoused the cause of Mrs. Woodhull, as a victim of Christian persecution. As to the "previous question," we must very respectfully disclaim all obligation to discuss, or to omit discussing, any matter whatever except on our own deliberate conviction of duty in the premises; and we must pluck up courage to endure as serenely as possible the condemnation of those who would substitute their convictions for ours in the ordering of our editorial course.

But on this particular subject we have hitherto said nothing because we have not known what to say. There is much which evidently remains undisclosed; and in a matter which most gravely affects the reputation and happiness of many parties, every just man will seek to avoid hasty and inconsiderate speech. So much as this, however, even with our very imperfect knowledge of facts, we are willing to say:—

1. It is probable that Mrs. Woodhull is not the real author of the repulsive charges to which she first gave circulation. We have no doubt that she believes them; but if they turn out to be slanders, her sincerity will not render her attack anything else than a crime of the greatest magnitude. No one has the least right to promulgate such charges against anybody without absolute and irrefutable proof; and the establishment of Mr. Beecher's innocence by the courts would, in the opinion of every right-minded person, be the conviction of Mrs. Woodhull of an intolerable offence against society. If, however, the charges are true, and she has proof sufficient to convince an impartial tribunal, she must be held to have rendered to society an incalculable service, and to have earned corresponding gratitude.

Furthermore, it appears that the method of meeting her charges has been cruel, unjust, arbitrary, and illegal in the extreme; and we believe that the growing demand for a strict judicial investigation of the whole affair is caused principally by the suspicion justly aroused in the public mind by the presumed necessity of resorting to such outrageous measures to suppress the charges. So far as Mrs. Woodhull is a representative of the American press, she is entitled to a most jealous defence of her rights by the community; and as a woman who believes herself to be the persecuted champion of a great cause, she is equally entitled to universal sympathy and commiseration in her evident distress. We say this without hesitation,—all the more because we believe her theories to be crude, untrue in the main, and impossible of realization, at least in society as now constituted, without involving immense harm to the highest interests of mankind.

2. Mr. Beecher is certainly entitled, by a long career of which every American ought to be proud, to enjoy the advantages of a just presumption of his entire innocence. If a life of distinguished services to his fellow-men, and a character hitherto untarnished by a whisper of detraction, are to count for nothing, what security is there for any man that his reputation may not be withered in an hour by the first breath of slander? The common chivalry of mankind, apart from all special gratitude, should acquiesce in the legal maxim, and pronounce every man innocent till he is proved to be guilty; and we envy no man either his head or his heart who rushes hastily into condemnation of one whose illustrious record has been thus far all in his favor.

But it is possible to rely too securely on a mere presumption; and we are frank to confess that Mr. Beecher cannot safely rely any longer upon it. If his friends know him to be innocent, as we willingly assume, they are guilty of the grossest wrong to him in not prosecuting his assailants openly for libel. The policy of "dignified silence" is henceforth stark folly. It is rapidly becoming a contempt for public opinion upon which public opinion will fearfully retaliate. We are more than inclined to consider

Mr. Beecher the victim of one of the basest conspiracies on record, exposed in the Brooklyn Sunday Review of June 1; but nothing remains now but to expose it in the courts, no matter who is hurt by it. "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall." Let all who love justice unite now in suspending all judgment where so much is at stake, until the courts shall have taken the testimony, sifted it, and thus furnished the grounds of a just and independent opinion by the public at large. Let favoritism and prejudice alike, whether on one side or the other, be put aside meanwhile. And let Mr. Beecher and his friends clearly understand that silence longer continued will inevitably be construed as confession.

THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE.

A gentleman by the name of John Brown Smith (whether real or assumed we do not know) has issued an appeal to "Spiritualists, Free Religionists, and Independent Christians," from which we make two extracts:—

"Let us hope that Spiritualists will be ready to cast aside their isms when the Free Religionists have outgrown theirs, and cordially meet them on the common platform of demonstrated immortality and individual freedom."

"Radicals, will you not fall into line on the common platform of immortality, with individual freedom on the rostrum and in the press?"

This is the ancient programme of sectarianism vamped up once more. "Believe as I do, and then we will work together; accept without question a demonstration of Immortality which is satisfactory to me, but not to you, and then you shall be free to question everything else you please!" There is not even a suspicion of radicalism in any such proposal as that.

The "Free Religionists," so-called, have no "isms" to outgrow; and we respectfully invite any one to point out what they are. Free Religion offers a common platform of search for truth in perfect freedom; and on that platform "Immortality" is at liberty to "demonstrate" itself, if it can. Personally, we hope it may succeed, although we do not think it has yet succeeded. But the platform thus offered is the only one on which ripe radicals can stand; and we recommend Mr. Smith to do what many of his Spiritualistic brethren, far more radical than himself, have done already; namely, put "individual freedom" first, not second.

A TRIUMPH OF THE CHRISTIANIZERS.

The Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention, on Friday, May 23, adopted the following preamble to the new Constitution which is to be submitted for approval to the people of that State: "We the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and humbly invoking His guidance, do ordain and establish this Constitution for its government."

The existing preamble to the Constitution is simply as follows: "We, the people of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, ordain and establish this Constitution for its government."

Comparison of these two preambles shows that the Christianizing party has gained a very significant victory in Pennsylvania over the liberals. It makes a backward step towards mediocrity, and reveals the unsuspected growth within a few years of a spirit which would welcome a return to the intolerant domination of religious fanaticism over all human interests. It is true that the Christianizers did not gain all that they wished in the direction of interpolating a creed into the fundamental law; they secured only a seemingly harmless expression of "gratitude to Almighty God;" yet the fact that a change of any sort was accomplished in that direction is one more of those numerous facts (such as that so discerningly pointed out last week by Mr. Frothingham) which ought to put every lover of liberty on his guard. Similar expressions are contained in the preambles to the Constitutions of most of the other States,—only seven of them, Delaware, Kentucky, Louisiana, Tennessee, Michigan, New Hampshire, and Oregon, having preambles free from all theological allusions. But the adoption of the proposed preamble in Pennsylvania is a retrograde movement carried in the face of open opposition in the Convention; and it shows that a party of dangerously unappreciated strength exists in this country, which is bent on turning back the current of liberal and secular ideas, if possible. Shall it succeed? Not if the friends of entire religious equality and freedom are on the alert to defend their principles. But if they are too sluggish, indifferent, stupid, or selfish to make the cause of universal human freedom their own, the preliminaries of a most perilous struggle will be surely and silently perfected. The newly planted batteries of the beleaguering foe begin to threaten on all sides, and the guns of Sumter are still asleep. Must we see the old drama re-enacted? If not, let there be a LIBERAL LEAGUE formed in every town without delay, to the end of instructing the community in the ideas now so feebly apprehended. Let who will be blind or inert, THE INDEX with fresh emphasis now calls on all who mean to protect religious liberty to ORGANIZE FOR ACTION.

THE REFRESHING OF THOUGHT.

Mr. Emerson says that one of the hardest tasks in the world is to think. And yet it is one of the most refreshing! Let the body be never so wearied, the spirits never so depressed, if the mind can get to thinking about great themes, and lose itself therein; or if a single great thought shall suddenly dawn upon the mental horizon, the flash of a new truth, or the new and clearer vision of an old one, illumine the instant,—then what a rebound is there to the whole system, a falling off of lassitude and dullness, an elastic recovery of all the best faculties and powers! No one can be unhappy long at a time who has the aptitude of thinking at all deeply and clearly, whose mind has the least habit of entertaining vigorous ideas. Out of the lowest depths of sadness one may climb to the highest heights of joy on the mounting progress of a great thought. A great feeling helps; but a great thought helps more, because, in the reverent mind, a great thought is sure to produce a great feeling. A vigorous mind and a pure heart work kindly together; they are married by Nature's law, and their union brings forth the offspring that giveth the highest satisfaction. A thought of the mind which seeks the truth cannot be content to stay in the cold regions of the intellect alone, but hastens into the presence of the soul; and there, in the embrace of love, it feels its deepest thrill and glows with its most beautiful blush. The man who has a mind truth-seeking, and a soul beauty-loving, is the king among men, whose kingdom is richest in mines of joy. When friends are false and friendships break, when light-winged fortune flies away, when doubt and disappointment cloud the mind, and sorrow and sadness drupe the heart, and pain cuts into the soul with a two-edged sword,—so long as we find out Truth and Beauty, and think and ponder upon the thoughts of the one, and kneel and adore before the visions of the other, we are proof against the long possession of melancholy, and can divert the heavy hand of care. David, in the midst of his affliction, said: "How precious are thy thoughts unto me, O, God!" Herder, on his dying bed, said to one standing near him: "Give me a great thought, that my soul may be refreshed before I go." Salvation by ideas he must somehow have felt was safer and better than salvation by Christ.

And, indeed, the sanitary power of ideas over both mind and body is incalculably great. Let a young man or woman have a keen interest in ideas, be eager to find them in books and conversation, and in intercourse with refined and cultivated men and women,—and we have a pretty sure guarantee that they will pass through life without much demoralization. Such an interest in free and fresh ideas is a more hopeful sign for their future, than a certificate of church-membership would be. The popular religion, with all its talk about "salvation," does not really save people; for, when it has finished its work of "conversion" with them, we frequently find it has left their minds without a great thought, and their hearts without a deep feeling. As Mr. Emerson once remarked, Calvinists have come to be about as frivolous as other people. Philosophy and science, which the Church affects so much to despise, work out a far truer salvation for men than the Church itself does, for they kindle in the mind a great thirst for knowledge, set on fire the soul with a love of truth, fill this life with significance and inspiration. "As a man thinketh, so is he," might be made to read, to the degree that a man thinketh, does he really live. Thought is life; thoughtlessness is death.

As with men, so with nations. Let a nation have a great idea—like that of liberty, for instance—and how it thrills with life! I shall never despair for France, or Spain, or Italy, so long as they have the ambition to be free. I can somewhat forgive the Communist for his wild excesses, because he committed them when he was frenzied with the grand ideas of liberty, fraternity, and equality! Such men as Joseph Mazzini, who furnish to the youth of a nation great thoughts of humanity, of duty, who teach them that life is a mission, are the real saviors of the world, and have brows fit to wear the undying laurel of fame. My only concern for the youth of America is that they shall not lose the consecration of the great idea that conceived and gave birth to their nation—the idea of civil and religious liberty for all. Let but the inspiration of this idea live and glow upon the altar of their souls, let them in their lives but be faithful to this, and the safety and glory of our country is secure; for this is the hope of all nations, and this the prophecy of the true civilization!

JESUS AS MASTER.

Men are always in a greater or less degree the products of preceding civilizations, and therefore it is quite impossible for us to say what the heroes of other ages would do were they alive to-day. Practical Christians, as they are called, vainly attempt to perform a miracle. Jesus, they tell us, is our great example and master, to be imitated and obeyed. They would jump the centuries between his life and ours, and placing him in our midst, rally to his standard. He is forever guide and master. I do not believe in miracles, and therefore I believe Jesus is an impossibility to-day. Let any man really attempt to do what "practical Christians" profess to do,—let any one, in fact as well as theory, accept Jesus as the perfect example and infallible teacher,—and he will soon find himself an anachronism, a Rip Van Winkle. He cannot live the life of Jesus, in this century, nor can he successfully be obedient to his teachings. All such attempts must result in failure. Men of different ages can be animated by the same spirit, but their lives must differ with the civilizations into which their lots are cast, and with their personal characteristics. As no two men are precisely alike in physical formation, so no two are precisely similar in mental and moral qualities, and the same life cannot possibly be lived by two persons differing physically, mentally, and morally. All great men are suggestions: they teach us an invaluable lesson, and that is the lesson of self-respect, self-trust. Jesus taught it. If I attempt to follow him, I find at the outset that I must repudiate him. Jesus was not a Christian. He called no man master. To follow him I must repudiate Christianity in all its forms. I must live my own life, be guided by my own conscience, and obedient not to his precepts but to the inner light that he claimed for himself and for all men.

After all, I suspect that our good friends who profess to believe in Jesus in this "Liberal" or "practical Christian" manner, do so in a Pickwickian sense only. They do not stop to reflect upon what Jesus would or would not do, or how he would direct them to act; they do not consult their Bibles when called upon to meet an emergency or to decide between right and wrong. They don't care what he would say. They obey the voice of God in their own souls; or, if they don't, they ought to.

"Certain people," says Domergue, "study all their lives; at death they have learned everything except how to think."

EVENING NOTES.

BY S. H. MORSE.

The news is good. A few more months, and THE INDEX will ride safely away from the late threatening quarrel. May there be no more evil omens! May the past feud be forgotten! Armed anew with "funds" equal to the emergency, let the little sheet resume its proper size, and cheerfully apply itself anew to the true work of each passing week. Will it come to Boston? We shall be glad to see it here. There are some conveniences which Boston supplies, to render the step advisable. Little does it matter where a paper of this sort is issued. If it is only alive to the great discussions of the time, no matter where the types are set. Locality is a matter of business convenience. THE INDEX "knows no North, no South, no East, no West," but only human nature, its aspirations and its needs. Then, come here, or stay there, or go where it may, the same heavens are over us all, and true words will all the same "pass muster." Long life to THE INDEX! Wide-awake tranquility to its editors! Wise happiness weekly increased to its readers!

CLASS DAY AT HARVARD was comparatively dull and woefully dusty. No rain since one can remember in this part of the world. The college green, like Boston Common, is fading out brown day by day. More dust than grass already. Is every green herb and sprig to disappear? Are we to dwell in a desert for a change? These dry reflections were not wholly dissipated within the frescoed walls of Appleton Chapel. An oration and a poem! I heard a lady remark when the orator had done: "Perhaps we were expecting too much; perhaps we don't enough consider their age." The young graduate's effort was not brilliant. It might be criticized; or, you might make the allowance, as suggested by the lady above quoted, for the young man's "age"—lack of age. But I doubt if consideration of that sort would be pleasing to him. No doubt he had toiled over his manuscript; it had age, if he had not. He deserves to be frankly dealt with. The oration, I judge, did not fairly represent the man. He must speak for his class, as the orator of '73." He must treat of local topics, college life, etc. This part he performed but indifferently. But the part which had a public and general interest brought him out to better advantage. Two points I note which show that he was quite in sympathy with the spirit of modern reform. The one refers to the introduction of the "elective system" in part into the collegiate course. The speaker seized the root of the philosophy (new or old) that is likely to expand into universal application. The gist of his remarks may be given thus: No one is so completely bound as when left to take the responsibility of his own private act. Apply this to the "school of life" generally, and we have the starting-point of what in my judgment is to be the method of the new civilization. The age of compulsion, force, the age of authority, of war, is to give way to a reign of Freedom and Peace. In this direction I see great significance in the new phrase of the time—Free Religion.

The other point which roused the author's pen into bold and vigorous touch related to the right of women to enter Harvard. Coming upon the heels of President Eliot's recent speech in opposition to such a step, the strongly expressed desire of the orator of '73 created not a little sensation, and won the only hearty applause of the occasion. If the young man at this point could have politely laid aside his own "gown"! The act would have had the grace of significance; it would have extemporized the fresh breeze for which everybody was sighing and fanning. White gloves and black gowns! Style should stick to good sense close as a brother.

A FEW SUNDAYS since Henry Ward Beecher occupied the Park Street pulpit, and a strange people the pews and aisles. Murray's congregation arrived too late. The doors were open at ten o'clock. The crowd rushed in. The old rule held good,—two bodies could not occupy the same space at the same time. It was a shabby performance, but the order of the day was not well anticipated. Barnum or Beecher,—it doesn't seem to matter which. In spite of culture, Boston turns out. But Beecher's discourse was better than Barnum's speech. To enjoy him, however, you must think of a friend whose Orthodoxy is somewhat loosened, and put yourself in his place. If you would be dumfounded, think of a good stiff deacon of seventy winters, and put yourself in his place. Beecher is taking the stiffening out of Orthodoxy, without doubt—Murray at the same business. But each has a fashion of gliding forward and backward which is puzzling to the plain mind. "He's slipping away into heresy," may be the impression this Sunday. The next: "He's all right—as sound as the fathers were." Mr. Beecher, however, is getting to put a rather steady emphasis on the ability of God's love to restore all souls and perfect the universe. His discourse here was all full of love, forgiveness, purgatory, restoration. The question was no longer about the Bible. The rising generation had to face the far more important issue of God or no God. There must be a new God placed in the heaven, or the world would go into atheism. He would himself rather be an atheist than bow to a God walled up within his own perfection,—a most comfortable being with no suffering love at work for the redemption of his gone astray, lost children. And this love must not be short-lived. It is the essence of God's being, and endures forever, active, omnipresent. The people seemed to enjoy the doctrine very much.

It seems that Mr. Murray, exchanging with Beecher, picked out a two-year-old sermon about God's justice. The report comes that Beecher's flock were not pleased with such flat-footed heterodoxy—Orthodoxy of the olden time. "He had no design in it," Beecher assured them when he arrived home. It is hard to probe the fact in such matters. Coming here the next Sunday, Murray turned again to the doctrine of love. True, love and justice might go hand in hand; but, theologically speaking, Orthodoxy has hitherto supposed that the last breath of the dying sinner was the signal for the Heavenly Father to shut off love and turn on justice. Now Beecher, Murray, and others, come and seem to say (a part of the time, at least), in the name of this same Orthodoxy, that it isn't so. There is no shutting off, no turning on; but a steady stream from eternity to eternity. Well, this simplifies matters, gives the universe a more wholesome atmosphere, pictures heaven as a more habitable place. But much remains for clearing up ere we see as not through a glass, darkly.

MR. ALCOCK I HAVE occasionally met of late. He has many pleasant things to say of the West, of his winter journey among western people. All doors and all churches seem to be open to him. It cannot be said that he is not as radically sound as most teachers of the word, but his is the "solvent word," that melts away all differences. He says, "Let us see in what we agree," and he reports that he can get most people of thoughtful minds to agree to the essential truths, the stable facts of a true philosophy. Mr. Alcock has certainly the secret of youth. He is young and he is old, and in this sense he may be said to be "all things to all men." He can understand old people and talk to their understanding. He can sympathize with youth, reverence with young persons their ideal, and talk to their edification. But all the while he holds fast to the silken thread of his own philosophy. It is a happy privilege to meet men and women on whose foreheads toil and the cares of the world have not set a fatal seal, nor dried up the flow of their enthusiasm.

MR. EMERSON HAS returned to his home, been most cordially received by his towns-people, and opened his own house and grounds to welcome them in return. The Concord people are beginning to think that they are favored by the gods.

THE BIBLE IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—I am not of the popular belief that it should be retained. The faith of the Protestant Church has arraigned for trial her charity. To the query, "Shall the Bible be taught in our common schools?" Faith answers, Yes; Charity, No. Which shall we abide by? True, it is a matter of conscience, but only individually so; for, when another man seeks to make his conscience in a religious matter mine, he errs; if he enforce it, then he does violence. Because the majority are in favor of its retention, does not make it right. Rights or wrongs are neither made nor unmade by majorities nor minorities. Godliness, truth, and charity are a majority at any time. The opposite line of argument is tyrannical. To support its theory, the Greek, Roman, and Mohammedan Churches, all of them larger than the Protestant, might suppress us, arguing that majority was right. Our fathers fought against this argument, and it is the force exercised by a majority on that theory that we are branding the Catholics with. The State cannot support liberal and free doctrines and consciences without making the instruction of the common school impartial.

A theory that a man would not trust his neighbor with is unfit for himself. See President Thiers, of France. No wonder the late election went against him. He upheld a doctrine for fifty years; but when he had the power to practise it, he was afraid to do it. Some are of the opinion that because they are Christians they should be held above suspicion. Beware of a man who wishes to do business with you on his profession. Look at the recent failure of the Atlantic Bank. Its insolvency is attributed to the men who were at the helm, standing upon their dignity of character to avoid investigation. If the president has a right to question, so has the depositor. Honest men court investigation, and he who cannot bear scrutiny is a rogue. —Rev. Dr. Wild (Evangelical).

I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise even a little but decidedly above the par of the religious world around us.—Dr. J. W. Alexander.

NEEK SELF-EXALTATION.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

We are told that a certain man, going to the Jewish temple for worship, uttered his thanksgiving in these words: "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week; I give tithes of all that I possess."

Throughout Christendom, there is a strong feeling of disapproval of the man whose devotion was publicly expressed in this manner. But suppose he had added the following words: "Nevertheless, none of these things have I done in mine own strength. God's grace has wrought this for me, and to him be all the glory." Would this have made the matter very much better? Is such public rehearsal of one's own possession of good qualities, or satisfactory continuance in good habits, a desirable thing, even though followed by an explicit disavowal of personal merit, as well as of vain-glorious boasting?

A negative answer to these questions would seem to be the correct one; and yet the opposite ground is taken by a highly respectable body of men, the managers of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the conductors of their daily prayer-meetings. Not only is it the custom of these men, in these meetings, frequently to repeat the statement of such desirable frames of mind, heights of spiritual experience, and improved habits of life, as they have "been enabled" to attain, and have at last, "not in their own strength," satisfactorily mastered, but the influence of those meetings is to impress the ignorant young people who resort there with the notion that such proclamation and repetition (always with the disclaimer annexed) are a duty, which will become binding on themselves whenever they shall have "been enabled" to make similar attainments. While the people at large continue to think that a tree is best known by its fruit, and a man by his untrumpeted life, attainments in the spiritual department are represented by the teachers above mentioned as incomplete without a frequent verbal advertising of them; and the converts in their meetings are given to understand that, while an amended life is very well so far as it goes, they must supplement it by repeated open declaration that it is amended. Jane Taylor, half a century ago, thought it needful to write and publish an essay entitled "Profession not Principle;" the doctrine of the Young Men's Christian Association seems to be that principle is incomplete without frequent repetitions of public profession.

If a workman, making announcement of the excellence of his chairs and tables, should add that this excellence was due, not to any strength or skill of his own, but to special endowments given him from on high, would the hearers be likely to credit him with eminent modesty, or his work with any special excellence? Common sense would rather dictate distrust of such professions. But is pretension of this sort in the spiritual department to be reckoned a merit instead of a fault? And is a frequent public enumeration of one's own attainments in piety justified by the speaker's adding—"To God be all the glory?"

The influence of the sort of prayer-meetings here referred to is to set their "converts" running in certain grooves of pious external observance; and among these no one is more strenuously insisted on than the formation of a habit of telling their fellow-men that they are pious. The leaders in these meetings enjoin, indeed, rectitude in the heart and in the life; but to this demand for right living they add the equally emphatic demand that public verbal proclamation of it be made. And when one of these leaders has said of his own attainments in the way of correct living something that sounds very like boasting, he is very careful to add—"I say it not boastingly." And this seeming self-justification (always with the disclaimer) is so frequently repeated by the same individuals, that the regular attendant for a year will have heard that very formula from each of them twenty or thirty times over.

The effect of such example upon the ignorant "converts" may be easily conceived. They see that talk of this sort is assumed, in that place, to be one main evidence, and indispensable among the evidences, of true piety; and they not only feel obliged, from the high standing of these teachers, to infer this process of factitious manifestation to be really indispensable, but, if they fail spontaneously to practise it, they are beset with suggestions and admonitions to that end.

"STAND UP FOR JESUS" is conspicuously placarded upon the walls of the Young Men's Christian Association; and the same injunction is repeated, more frequently than any other, in their prayer-meetings, by way of admonition to young converts. Interpreted in one way, this injunction would be most appropriate, since the reformatory precepts of Jesus are as much needed now as when he uttered them, their true meaning being perverted and misstated by the Church, as well as neglected by those whom the Church sanctimoniously calls "the world." But in these meetings, on the contrary, the thing meant by "standing up for Jesus" is expressly declared to be standing up to declare, to an assembly of pious people, the "unmerited" attainment of a piety like their own, and the satisfaction imparted by it. The young converts are told that it is their duty to take up the cross; and are distinctly and emphatically told that this oft-repeated public verbal announcement of the spiritual advancement which they have attained without meriting it is "taking up the cross," and is also "standing up for Jesus." And if they fail to make this parade, of attainment on the one hand and of want of desert on the other, they are rebukingly asked whether they are "ashamed of Jesus;" as if this very sort of wordy demonstration had not been specially discountenanced by Jesus—as if such periodical talk-meetings as these people hold, representing them to be indispensable to the fulfilment of Christian duty, had ever been held, or enjoined, or recommended, by that great reformer!

It is sometimes objected to criticism like the above: "Suppose these people are in the wrong; suppose they do misunderstand and misrepresent both Jesus and the admirable doctrine of trust in God and love to men which he taught,—it is plain that they are obstinately bent upon adherence to their theological and ecclesiastical notions; why not let them enjoy their delusion? They are joined, as the prophet said, to their idols; why not let them alone?"

The reason for calling public attention to the folly of these sounders of their own trumpet is that their superstition is a mischievous one. Their influence tends to mislead those who come within its scope, in relation to matters of the very highest importance. They teach false and injurious views respecting God and man, and the relation between them. Dogmatizing absurdly in regard to the destiny of human beings in the future life, they make assumptions equally absurd as to the duties and occupations of our existence here. To this misrepresentation of interests common to the whole human race, they add frequent misrepresentation of the doctrine and character of those who teach a more rational faith; and, as the correction of misstatements of this sort is carefully excluded both from their meetings and their publications, it seems well to put the foregoing facts on record, where a portion of the public, at least, may be warned respecting the influence and tendency of the meetings above described.

Of course the influence of those meetings is not wholly evil; it even decidedly helps those of their frequenters who are tempted to gross vices, such as theft and drunkenness; or to vulgar habits, such as profanity, smoking, and gambling. Young people who yield to the prayer-meeting proselytism are really strengthened by it to avoid misconduct of the disreputable sort. On the other hand, they usually suffer a complete arrest of mental development, and also a deterioration or perversion of both the mental and moral faculties. How this takes place, I will try to show in another article.

SCÉPTICISM IN THE SENATE.

ST. PAUL, SENATE CHAMBER, Feb. 23, 1872.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Possibly the following informal discussion of a question of "privilege," which took place in the senate chamber here yesterday, just before the senate was called to order, may seem to you worthy of preservation among indicative jests.

The Lieutenant Governor being absent, the question arose who should be president pro tempore of the senate; when Senator W. (who had distinguished himself the day before by the use of some very forcible, though quite unparliamentary, language in the "heat of debate") said: "The chaplain and I will run the senate to-day; the chaplain is to do the praying, and I'll do the swearing."

SEN. McD.—"The senate has assurance that both functions will be most ably performed."

SEN. E.—"Yes, and judging by results—a la Tyndall—it will be difficult to determine which of you takes the name of the Lord most in vain!"

REPORTER.

A minister examined his schoolboys thus: "What is the meaning of the word 'repentant'?" "Please, sir, don't know." "Now, if I had stolen a loaf of bread, what should I be?" "Please, sir, locked up." "Well, should I feel sorry?" "Yes." "Well, why should I feel sorry?" "Please, sir, cos you was caught."

Church attendance at Berlin is slim. Out of 650,000 Protestant inhabitants, only 13,000 are church-goers.

The Divorce of Senator Sumner from his wife was so easily and quietly accomplished a few days since in Boston as to render it notable among divorces of people high in social position. Not the slightest impropriety was alleged on either side. It was a match of affection; but both parties were so mature, and so fixed in their ways and habits of life, as not to harmonize. Each found out that a mistake had been committed; so, to remedy it as far as possible, Mrs. Sumner went quietly to Europe, where she has since dwelt, and by her protracted and intentional absence has given Mr. Sumner the statutory right to claim a divorce on the technical ground of abandonment—all parties meanwhile remaining on "terms of respectful tenderness." Hon. Samuel Hooper, M. C. of Boston, his father-in-law, maintains the most intimate relations with Mr. Sumner, and, though losing him as a legal son-in-law, clings to him as closely as ever as one of the best of friends.

Will the English people be favorably impressed with such oriental royalty as that attaching to the Persian Shah? He is to reach London with his three wives and his retinue and an immense amount of pomp and pageantry, to-morrow evening. That thousands will crowd and jostle each other to see such a wonderful exhibition is precisely what would occur in New York, the land of liberty and equality. The same motive, precisely, actuates the mass of people who fill the streets to see an imposing military parade. In England the people do not hold such royalty at any great figure, and then there is the absurd feature of entertaining and showing boundless respect for three wives. Why not tolerate a similar social eccentricity in Mr. John Snooks, of Chicago, say, who comes to London to see the sights? Is there any great moral difference between Snooks, of Chicago, with three wives, and the Shah of Persia with only three of several Mrs. Shahs?—Brooklyn Eagle.

FIVE YEARS FOR TEN CENTS.—John Fork, a cigar-maker, aged twenty-two, a native of Germany, was in the general Sessions yesterday on an indictment for stealing ten cents from John J. Nevell. On the afternoon of March 15, while Mr. Nevell was walking in Fulton street, towards Nassau, two boys, John Shay and John Fork, suddenly appeared from the hallway of No. 15, and after walking together some fifty feet, Shay took twenty cents from his overcoat pocket, half of which he dropped on the sidewalk, and Fork picked it up. In defence, Fork testified that he was not acquainted with Shay, and that he picked up the ten cents not knowing that it had been stolen. The jury, nevertheless, found him guilty, and Recorder Hackett sentenced him to State Prison for a term of five years at hard labor.—N. Y. Sun, June 4.

There is a curious story told in our dispatches, of a bogus Pope reigning, and of the death of Pius IX. nearly a month ago. The pontifical chair is said to be filled for the occasion by an old astute priest named Abbate Misuti, who is the image of Pius, and keeps up this singular masquerade even to the taking of a pinch of snuff during mass. It is further stated that the adherents of the church, for their own convenience till the election of a successor to Pio Nino, will permit their lummy to receive deputations, smile stably, utter compliments in Latin, take a walk now and then in the Vatican gardens, and perform such of the sacred ceremonies as are indispensable; but anything beyond that he will not do.—Salt Lake Tribune.

A week ago Bret Harte described the sad end of Bill Nye and the fate met with at the hands of the Moors. We thought we had heard the end of him, but yesterday the Republican revived him in order to figure at the Battle of Waterloo: "At this moment Nye was ordered up with the 1st Guard." As the Guard died, but never surrendered, we are unable to account for his subsequent appearance in California, but leave it to the Republican and Bret Harte to settle it between them.—St. Louis Globe.

Perhaps the shortest speech ever delivered in any legislative chamber was that of the member of the United States Congress, who, having got out this sentence: "Mr. Speaker, the generality of mankind in general are disposed to exercise oppression on the generality of mankind in general," was pulled down to his seat by a friend with the remark: "You'd better stop; you are coming out at the same hole you went in at!"

THE INSIDE HISTORY

OF THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

By FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

This is a handsomely printed pamphlet of 51 pages, containing the full explanation of the recent "INDEX troubles" which was submitted to the stockholders of the Index Association at their Second Annual Meeting, June 7, 1873. It is hoped that every one who has read the statements of the other side will in fairness read this also. PRICE (postpaid), 25 cents. Address the Author, Toledo, Ohio.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA," by G. D. H. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY," together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others. PRICE, 25 cents; in packages of five or more, 20 cents each.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

Every Man and Woman who reads THE INDEX ought to read also The Golden Age, edited by Theodore Tilton. After fifteen years of experience on The Independent, Mr. Tilton two years ago established, in the interest of more liberal thought, The Golden Age, a journal of his own, to which he gives his constant and toll-free attention, and which has already won a national reputation for honesty, courage, and brilliancy. Probably no other journal in America is so widely quoted from, both by those who agree, and those who disagree with it. Unlike any other weekly paper, either in America or England, it is unique and original in appearance, in thought, and in style. It abounds in brief and spicy paragraphs—shot like swift arrows hitting the mark. Its editorial discussions cover the whole field of current topics—whether religious, political, literary, social, or industrial. It does not pretend, or seek, or want to agree with its readers, or with the general popular opinion. It indulges in the luxury of free speech. It has a mind of its own, and is sometimes wrong—which makes it all the more novel, for it is almost the only journal of the American press that is ever wrong. But whether right or wrong, it is always good natured, and ever believes in fair play. It would be happy to make the acquaintance of the readers of THE INDEX; and though The Golden Age is in no sense a rival to THE INDEX, and does not undertake to do such a work as Mr. Abbot has embarked upon, yet it is fighting a battle for free thought in religion, and free speech in politics, and is conscientiously dedicated to the promotion of whatever helps forward the Emancipation of the Human Mind. Anybody who subscribes for Mr. Tilton's paper will get something to think about, and more than the money's worth. Enclose three dollars in an envelope (before you forget it), and address

THE LITERARY WORLD,

A Monthly Periodical Devoted Exclusively to Literature.

This paper begins its fourth volume, June 1, 1873. It has been the aim of its conductor to make it an acceptable vehicle of honest and trustworthy criticism, just to books and helpful to readers.

Book-reviews will continue to be its leading feature; while the other departments—Editorials, brief Book-notices, Notes and Queries, Literary News, and the monthly lists of American publications—will be full and attractive.

JOHN G. WHITTIER, says: "I have been a constant reader of this paper, the LITERARY WORLD, and have learned to place a high estimate upon the ability, candor, and conscientious thoroughness and impartiality of its critical reviews and notices. In deferring to its judgment in the purchase of new books, I have rarely been disappointed. I unhesitatingly recommend it to the patronage of the public."

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON says: "I am free to say that your experiment in this direction seems to me more promising than anything else of the kind which has yet appeared." The Boston Advertiser says: "It is a matter of congratulation that a periodical so strictly devoted to honest literary criticism as the LITERARY WORLD, has won its way to a sustaining appreciation and patronage."

NEW INDEX TRACT.

A STUDY OF RELIGION: THE NAME AND THE THING.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

As the entire edition of THE INDEX for March 8 (No. 167), with the exception of a small number reserved for binding, has been already exhausted, the above lecture can only be supplied in tract form. See advertisement of INDEX TRACTS. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies for $1.00. Address THE INDEX, TOLEDO, OHIO.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now 'Truths for the Times,' and I send them from my inmost heart; and I agree almost every word." New Edition. PRICE 10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, confusion, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Fourth Ten thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and The Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

Alexander Smyth, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters, and personages, dialogue and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus while upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook, and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the Great Fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors and we shall print a large and all new demand.

The "INVESTIGATOR" is devoted to the liberal cause in Religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to the things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered the unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It has just entered its 43d year, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader! please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the "INVESTIGATOR" is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer.

On the Galla Religion.

BY PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN.

The Gallas are a people who live to the south of Abyssinia, in a very low state of civilization. The facts concerning their religion here adduced are drawn from the writings of Lorenz Tutschek,—"Dictionary and Grammar of the Galla Language, Munich, 1844-5." Probably more has been learned concerning them in these twenty-five years past, either by new intercourse, or by studying the numerous MSS. of Karl Tutschek, who died prematurely. His brother Lorenz, who has edited the Grammar and Dictionary, was drawn into African philology by nothing but the death of Karl; and professes (in 1844) his inability to use to advantage the large materials left in his hands. A sketch is here given of the very interesting account, in order to give the reader confidence that the documents here laid before him, however fragmentary, are authentic.

Duke Maximilian of Bavaria redeemed four young negroes at an African slave mart, and brought them to Germany for education, supposing them to be three Nubians and one Abyssinian. He secured for their tutor a young jurist, Karl Tutschek, who had been distinguished in linguistic study, and was acquainted with Sanskrit, Hebrew, and Arabic. After about ten weeks, Tutschek at length discovered that they were neither Nubian nor Abyssinian; that three of them had only been a year away from home, and were of excellent capacity. The youngest had forgotten most of his language and of his people, and was depressed in mind by the circumstance. They belonged to the four nations—Galla, Umale, Darfur, and Denka—and communicated with one another, very imperfectly, in vulgar Arabic. After awhile, he excited in them the desire to impart to him all that they could tell of their homes and countries, sometimes in reply to direct questions, sometimes in connected narrative suggested by him or originated by themselves. The Tutscheks do not hesitate to ascribe to some of these compositions, which were wholly oral, "great solidity and elegance as to style, contents, and arrangement," notwithstanding the youth of the narrators. Lorenz accounts for this by reminding us that the art of relating is cultivated by oriental people [by illiterate people?], and that those children of Nature are from earliest childhood eminently observant of external things, and closely acquainted with the circumstances of their villages and tribes. Karl Tutschek directed his study first to the Galla language, spoken in Akafade, which appeared to be best vocalized and easiest; but Lorenz applies to the Umale (Jalo Jordan Aré) the epithet highly flexible. Three volumes of his dictations were in Lorenz's hands when he wrote. He adds that they "deserve the praises that have been bestowed on their sterling worth as to form and contents, and bear the impression of mature judgment and critical truth." They are divided into such as are the reproduction of the excellent memory of Jalo, and such as are his own free compositions. Jalo declared himself to be the nephew of Wofter Mat, hereditary king of the Yumales. But the Gallas alone here concern us.

On January 2, 1841, in a sitting of the philosophical class at Munich, Karl Tutschek read a report of his investigations, and laid before it a tolerably complete Dictionary of the Galla language, a sketch of the Grammar, and many dictations, prayers, and songs. He had received from M. Jomard of Paris a treatise of the Galla language, extracted from the bulletin of the Geographical Society, August, 1839, which in many ways confirmed his own results. He even found in it prayers of the Gallas, nearly agreeing with those dictated by Akafade. What was better still, he gained two months' intercourse with a second Galla named Otshu Aga, who had been delivered from slavery by Mr. Pell. By him not only all that he had learned was confirmed, but materials were given for comparing two dialects of Galla, and the number of dictations, prayers, and songs was increased. Otshu and Akafade presently became warm friends, and at Tutschek's suggestion, entered into correspondence. Hereby he got fourteen letters, valuable alike for philology and for exhibiting the mind and soul of the correspondents. Further, through Otshu, an African girl by name Bililo was introduced to Tutschek. She had been supposed Abyssinian, but was really from the Galla country Gima, and had taught Otshu Aga many of her songs, which Tutschek noted down. A fourth native Galla, Aman Gonda, who had been brought to Europe by Duke Paul of Wirtemberg, was visited by Tutschek. He had been a magistrate under the service of his prince, had been better educated, and appeared to speak his own language correctly. For these reasons, Tutschek set much value on his communications.

The chief occupations of the Gallas are agriculture and cattle-tending; but subordinate to these, in their villages, are weavers, tanners, potters, leather-cutters, and workers in metal, who furnish warlike implements. The form of government is royalty; but, as separate tribes have different kings, the king seems to be not much above the Arab chieftain. The royalty is generally hereditary, but is occasionally changed by election. Their religion is a monotheism, penetrating deep into all practical life, but obscured (says Lorenz Tutschek) by many superstitions. This is only to be expected; but no superstition appears in his specimens of their prayers, which, with a few verbal changes of mere English dialect, are the following:—

MORNING PRAYER.

O God, thou hast brought me through the night in peace; bring thou me through the day in peace! Wherever I may go, upon my way which thou madest peaceable for me, O God, lead my steps! When I have spoken, keep off calumny [falsehood?] from me. When I am hungry, keep me from murmuring. When I am full, keep me from pride. Calling upon thee I pass the day, O Lord who hast no Lord.

EVENING PRAYER.

O God, thou hast brought me through the day in peace; bring thou me through the night in peace! O Lord who hast no Lord, there is no strength but in thee. Thou only hast no obligation. Under thy hand I pass the day; under thy hand I pass the night. Thou art my Mother; thou my Father.

LITURGY

After the Sufferings of a Bloody Invasion.

Good God of the earth, my Lord! thou art above me, I am below thee. When misfortune comes to us, then, as trees keep off the sun, so mayest thou keep off misfortune. My Lord! be thou my screen. Calling upon thee I pass the day, calling upon thee I pass the night. When this moon rises, forsake me not. When I rise, I forsake not thee. Let the danger pass me by.

God my Lord! thou Sun with thirty rays! when the enemy comes, let not thy worm be killed upon the earth, but keep him off; as we, seeing a worm upon the earth, crush him if we like, or spare him if we like. As we tread upon and kill a worm on the earth, so thou, if it please thee, crushest us upon the earth. God! thou goest, holding the bad and the good in thy hand. My Lord! let us not be killed. We, thy worms, are praying to thee.

A man who knows not evil and good, may not anger thee. But if once he knew it, and was not willing to know it, this is wicked. Treat him as it pleases thee.

If he formerly did not learn, do thou, God my Lord! teach him. If he hear not the language of men, yet will he learn thy language.

God! thou hast made all the animals and men that live upon the earth. The corn also upon the earth, on which we are to live, thou hast made. Thou has given us strength. Thou has given us cattle and corn. We worked with them and the seed grew up for us.

With the corn which thou hadst raised for us, men were satisfied. But the corn in the house hath been burnt up. Who hath burnt the corn in the house? Thou knowest.

If I know one or two men, I know them by seeing them with my eye; but thou, even if thou didst not see them with the eye, knowest them by thy heart.

A single bad man has chased away all our people from their houses. The children and their mother hath been scattered, like a flock of turkeys, hither and thither.

The murderous enemy took the curly-headed child out of his mother's hand and killed him. Thou hast permitted all this to be done. But why so? Thou knowest.

The corn which thou raisest, thou shonest to our eyes. To it the hungry man looketh and is comforted. Yet when the corn bloometh, thou sendest into it butterflies and locusts and doves. All this comes from thy hand. Thou hast caused it. But why so? Thou knowest.

My Lord! spare those who pray to thee. As a thief stealing another's corn is bound by the owner of the corn, not so bind thou us, O Lord! But thou, binding the beloved one, settest him free by love.

If I am beloved by thee, so set me free, I entreat thee from my heart. If I do not pray to thee with my heart, thou hearest me not. But if I pray to thee with my heart, thou knowest it, and art gracious unto me.

The inquiry suggests itself, How old is this religion of the Gallas? It contains no trace of Mohammedan, nor yet of Christian influence. God is, in their belief, as Lorenz Tutschek observes, the One Supreme, almighty, all-knowing, all-wise, and all-good. No prophet, no angel appears. If the religion were an independent reform originated in modern times, Theism superseding Polytheism, one might expect some prophet's name to be connected with it. Prima facie, the probability seems rather to be that it is contemporaneous with Hebrew Theism and akin with the old Abyssinian religion; perhaps, also, with that of Sheba, which was the south east corner of Arabia.

In a paper read before the Philological Society of London in 1847, I tried to show the relation of the Galla verb and pronouns to those of other known tongues; and claimed for the language a place in the class which Pritchard has styled Hebræo-African. This class, besides the group related closely to Arabic and Hebrew, comprises the Abyssinian language, those of Mount Atlas and the Great Western Desert (of which the Zouave is now the best known), and perhaps even the ancient Egyptian.

We know that the old Abyssinian language, called the Gheez, differed little from Hebrew, and that there was an ancient sympathy between the Hebrews and Sheba (where Jewish princes ruled, in the time of the Maccabees); also between Judæa and Abyssinia. It may be thrown out for further inquiry, whether possibly a common Theism was maintained, a thousand years before the Christian era, in these three countries, and also in that of the Gallas.

CONTRAST BETWEEN MORALITY AND RELIGION.

AN ESSAY READ IN THE "STAR CLUB" OF TITUSVILLE, PA., JUNE 1, 1873.

BY MORRIS EINSTEIN.

When we judiciously inquire into the nature of Morality and Religion, we find a vastly greater difference, and even antagonism, between them than most people are aware of or ready to admit. Morality is simple, easy to comprehend, and therefore without difficulty definable to the comprehension of everybody. It is, furthermore, the judge and monitor in our inmost nature, that judges our thoughts and sentiments, urges us on to purify them, encourages us to perform those acts which she recognizes as right and good, be the consequences what they may, and admonishes us as strongly to free ourselves from every impure thought and sentiment, and to abstain from any and every act that she recognizes as wrong and bad. On our conforming to her laws, she manifests her approval by the sweetest peace and the happiest satisfaction and contentment in our heart; as she also manifests her disapproval on our transgressing her laws, by the most painful remorse and unrest of mind. In all this, men, no matter what their nationality or culture—the lowest types of humanity and wild savages alone excepted—will probably agree; for the elements, the general teachings, of Morality are so strongly implanted in our nature that they form an integral part of it, and will, unless prevented by unfavorable conditions, naturally develop themselves, requiring no supernatural revelation and no miraculous promptings.

Such, however, is by no means the case with Religion. Yet, while unable to deny or even effectually to dispute the excellence of Morality, it nevertheless refuses to acknowledge the supremacy of her laws and the value of moral acts unsanctified by religious authority and unaccompanied by "Faith." Some, if not all religions are even so antagonistic to Morality as to recognize Faith alone as the way to perfection and happiness ("salvation"), denying to Morality all value unless faith in peculiar dogmas and doctrines sanctions it. Surprising as this may appear to us, it is nevertheless the logical and necessary consequence of the essentially different natures of Morality and Religion. In order to account for this antagonism, and decide rightly as to the respective claims of the two, it will become necessary for us to analyze them more critically.

But before we attempt this, it will be well to recollect that Religion cannot so easily and satisfactorily be defined as Morality, because it is not so definite in itself, and because its laws, dogmas, and doctrines are not so uniformly or generally accepted. Hence almost every theological writer has given us a different definition of Religion. Very naturally so, too, I think. For education, early imbibed prejudices, habits of thought, mental qualities, and a multitude of other similar causes exert the greatest influence on the individual in forming his conception of Religion, inclining him to the doctrines of a special religion, or making him sceptical. Hence even the believers in the same special religion vary most essentially in their individual views and conceptions of Religion. And although they may all agree in ascribing to it, as is generally done, a double source and character, yet they vary again very materially as to the nature of this source and character. Thus, to the most intensely religious, to those who claim to be the only "truly religious," religion is something entirely objective—coming to man, according to their theory, by "Divine grace," or "supernatural revelation." To others, on the contrary, it is something subjective: is essential to man, a part of his nature, coming to him by "Intuition," and its special teachings and truths, according to some, also by supernatural revelation of the Deity,—according to others again, partly by this, and partly by the assistance of our own mental faculties and the revelations in and of Nature. These differences of views, as already indicated above, result respectively from the more mystical or the more rational turn of mind of the different believers. In either case, however, as soon as a supernatural revelation is believed in and admitted, this "Divine revelation" must of necessity become superior to any power, faculty, knowledge, or truth man may possess or be able to attain. Hence an implicit faith in and a life in harmony with this revelation must be the highest aim of the believer in it. Further, as this revelation is supposed to come to us from "on high," mere faith in it becomes something really good and meritorious, making us indeed the "children of God," his "elect" and "favorites," the "heirs of his kingdom," while those who doubt or disregard it become his "enemies," must suffer his "displeasure and punishment." Hence not only the reason, but really the justification, of the intolerance and persecution found among intensely religious peoples and individuals of every religion.

Morality, on the contrary, depends on no other revelation than her own, is independent of all and every inspiration save her own, teaches but her own laws and sublime truths, which, when not obscured by ignorance, superstition, or the prejudices engendered by religious trainings, are invariably the same in and for all men; for they are, as already stated, founded on the very nature of man, demonstrable by science and philosophy, and in harmony with the deductions of reason, which, with the spontaneous judgments of morality herself, forms the conscience. Of course I mean the true and real, the human, conscience, and not the falsely so-called religious conscience, which is artificial, the product of accidental circumstances.

But what gives Morality a still higher value is the impartiality and unerring correctness of her judgments, the directness and quickness of her sentences, and the never-failing effect on our happiness or unhappiness. As repeatedly stated in this essay, Morality is based on the highest faculty of man, his reason; and her laws, sustained as they are by science, philosophy, and experience, are consequently the highest man can perceive. It is also these sublime laws by which she judges our thoughts, sentiments, and actions. Highly important as this certainly is, it is not sufficient; and Morality might, for all that, be indeed of very little value to us if her functions ended here. But this is happily by no means the case. Conscience (as defined above) is always active in our mind, albeit its voice is not always heeded by us; and it either approves of our thoughts and sentiments, encourages us and urges us on to moral actions, or admonishes us to abstain from those of which she disapproves and condemns as immoral. Morality, furthermore, lends to the conscience such a fine sensibility, such an unalloyed happiness or such agonizing unhappiness, according as she approves or disapproves of our thoughts, sentiments, and actions, that they both in their union become the surest and most reliable guides for men in all and every situation of life; a wholesome humiliation in fortune, a sweet comforter in misfortune, an effective consolator in suffering, pain, losses, or injustice, and withal such a blessing and felicity for the moral man, that nothing can be compared with it unless it be, by way of contrast, the misery, suffering, and unhappiness of the immoral.

But what immensely enhances the high value of Morality is the fact that this state of happiness or unhappiness results spontaneously from our own acts, and accompanies them simultaneously; and that we can by no means escape from these inevitable results. The consciousness of the certainty of these results of our actions becomes thus a new stimulus, and a strong one, to the good, the moral, and a terror and effective monitor to the bad, the immoral; for they both are convinced that this happiness or unhappiness is the sure, real, and immediate result of obedience or disobedience to the never-changing laws of Morality.

It is especially herein that Morality so greatly varies from, and so infinitely surpasses, Religion; which receives her laws from a pretended supernatural revelation, that itself rests on faith alone. This pretended supernatural revelation, moreover, emanates confessedly from a Being of whose very existence there is not only no evidence, but whose very nature and essence, if existing, surpasses totally all human comprehension. The natural consequence of all this is, that all the various supernatural revelations (for it must be borne in mind that almost every noted nation of antiquity claimed some such revelation as peculiarly its own) vary most decidedly from one another, and very often contradict one another to such a degree that what is declared as of the highest importance or most sacred and meritorious in the one, is pronounced false, wrong, or wicked by the other. Even the teachings of one and the same religion, founded on one and the same pretended revelation, frequently contradict themselves and change their character, form, and meaning in course of time. For each of these various revelations is so enveloped in mysteries, and so mixed up with human additions, alterations, interpolations, forgeries, fables, and legends, that volumes upon volumes of commentaries have been necessary, and the wisest men's wits have been taxed to the utmost, to explain it and define the "true sense" of its teachings. After all these pains have been taken, we still find that what is really fine, true, and good in them is taught much more plainly by Morality; while what is puerile, false, or bad in them, and only that, is properly their own. Thus it is often found, even in what are generally considered the best of religions, that the most important doctrines are false, imaginary, or even objectionable, when tested by the pure light of reason and the sublime standard of Morality.

True, it is claimed by the advocates of Revelation and the votaries of Religion, that the "religious" man finds in the simplicity of his faith and the consciousness of his "religiousness" an equal happiness and satisfaction to that which the "merely moral" man finds in Morality and in the approval of his own conscience. But, waiving now a more critical examination of the correctness or incorrectness of this claim, and avoiding the lengthy metaphysical dissertation to which it must lead, I would only call attention to the indisputable fact that, while the claim of happiness of the former is based on belief merely, and is thus at least very liable to be illusory and imaginary, that of the latter is founded in the very nature of his being, his real consciousness, and the harmony and agreement of all his highest faculties. The former, furthermore, rests his happiness on a dubious future existence; while the latter is sure of it here, since he finds it in himself, resulting from and inevitably following his own actions. Thus Religion may, as it actually often does, make fanatics of us; Morality never. The latter can only make us more perfectly human, better men and women. Religion may, nay must, make us intolerant; Morality, on the contrary, more philanthropic, humane, tolerant, and forbearing. Religion may make us infatuated anchorites, "crucifying the flesh" and despising the world and ourselves; Morality will teach us how to live rightly, how to be useful to ourselves and to others, how to perfect ourselves and the world we live in, and how to make it a happy abode for ourselves and our fellow-beings. Religion, then, is but an ignis fatuus leading those astray that follow it; Morality, however, is a bright, glorious luminary that sheds its beneficent rays on the path of our life, that we may travel it and stumble not.

PAUL GOWER.

A RATIONALISTIC STORY

OR

That brings me to my shipmates, of whom you'll expect some sort of description. There was only one first cabin passenger besides Maberley—a queer, foolish young fellow, who smoked a great deal, and delighted in all sorts of eccentricity. He actually cut off the legs of his trousers above the knees, and went hopping about the deck in those extemporized knickerbockers, like a preposterous bird. I think he must have been half crazy. The steerage and intermediate contained over a hundred of us plebeians—English, Irish, German, and miscellaneous. But perhaps I ought to say something first about the officers and crew, especially as I can dismiss them very summarily.

Our captain was a hard-featured, wrinkled old salt from New Hampshire, U. S., and a teetotaler, who swore by General Jackson and talked through his nose. The mate I have spoken of before—an ill-conditioned, arbitrary beast, who hated everything English and was ultra-Yankee in his conceit of his own country. He regarded the passengers as nuisances, and bullied the crew most tyrannically. They would have liked to murder him. He was a good sailor, though. Dick (who made a wonderful caricature of him—mine is a likeness) says that all good business men must be disagreeable in virtue of their efficiency.

The second mate was a burly, stocky, thick-set Briton from Newcastle—not at all a bad fellow—who had been shipwrecked three times in succession, and recently only escaped with life from a burning vessel. The sailors called him Jonah, which he didn't like. They have a prejudice against unlucky people, approximating towards superstition. They were a rough lot, of various nationalities, Dutch and English predominating—all young fellows, and certainly not enough to work the ship without aid from the steerage; which is, I think, pretty generally calculated upon in vessels carrying emigrants. We pulled at the ropes with the rest. One sailor, called Frank, a very picturesque, hairy fellow, of whom I append a portrait, had been aboard a slaver, and told horrid yarns about the detestable traffic, of which (he was an American) he seemed to think nothing. He said they used to sprinkle tacks among the negroes stowed away between decks, to make them lie quiet, and prevent the bigger and stronger ones fighting for room, which damaged the women and children! The nails, running into their naked flesh when they stirred, kept them still; and though this hurt, it didn't spoil them for sale. This, he added, was the regular practice nowadays; before it was thought of, the owners were put to no end of expense for irons.

But now let us descend into the steerage and pay our respects to the Germans, who are largely in the majority among the passengers. They were mostly bound for the far West, and travelled in companies—a good plan, and one which other emigrants (except Mormons) don't seem to have adopted. These companies had a captain, elected by general vote: a jolly fellow with a red beard and a perpetual pipe—always in his shirt-sleeves and never out of temper. He lived in the United States, knew the route and the place to which his party were going, and it was his business to "put them through" as conveniently and economically as possible. He had bargained for their passage, laid in provisions wholesale, and, on the voyage, detailed men and women to the cooking department; and his decision was final in all disputes and quarrels. Those over whom he presided were a queer, good-natured lot, as funny to look at as if they had just stepped out of the pages of a comic German paper. There were odd old men with long hair, like tow, or short as bristles, and quaint, nut-cracker visages; stumpy, harsh-featured young ones, sporting the stiffest and most prickly of moustachios; skinny old women whose faces remind one of Albert Durer's engravings; plain, thick-waisted frauleins, and unlimited children—little flaxen-headed things, curiously like their seniors. The men wore extraordinary clothes, long coats of green balze with ornamental flourishes in red or yellow worsted about the capes and cuffs and pockets; short ones of bright blue or dirty orange, fitting as tight as if their owners had been melted and poured into them; trousers like skins or as loose as collapsed balloons; all sorts of hats and caps, and shoes—well, looking as if the feet wearing them had been dipped in ink and then let dry. Also the knobbyest, dustiest boots; and various kinds of slippers, generally decorated with beads or braid. As for the women, you must excuse my attempting their costume: like most of my sex I can't describe female attire beyond saying that it's pretty or the reverse. That of the fraus was emphatically dowdy and buy-a-broomish, with a tendency to be bulgy, or straight all the way down, and to terminate in blue stockings and roomy carpet-slippers.

All of which peculiarities, observe, don't prevent these poor Germans from being very worthy, industrious folk—about as good raw material, I fancy, as the old world sends here to be ground out into citizens of the great republic; which boasts, and not without reason, that it has a home for everybody. They all seem to do well, to stay and prosper. You are quite surprised, in New York, at the number of German and Dutch names on the streets and houses. I was, too, delighted to identify the localities mentioned in that famous "Knickerbocker" history (which you could never see the fun of)—how little I thought, when I first read it, that I should have the luck to come here! I intend, if I have time, to go and explore Communipaw, and Sleepy Hollow, and Hell Gate (awful name, isn't it?) and other places immortalized by Washington Irving—though the people here don't seem to think much of 'em. It's always so: when Harry and I went to Stratford-on-Avon, we lodged at an inn the landlord of which had never been inside the house where Shakespeare was born.

But let me get back to my Germans aboard the "Cayuga." They smoked, and talked, and sang, and made the best of everything, especially the cookery, for nothing in the shape of food seemed to come amiss to them. Thus they ate raw ham, and concocted soups from beer, cabbage, potatoes, broken biscuit, beans, peas—separate or altogether. In which connection, I may incidentally mention that what with paying the cook for his valuable services and buying bread of him (highly-flavored with an abomination called saleratus), we spent so much money that we might have gone cheaper in the first cabin. Never mind! we had our fun for our money, and didn't repent it.

There were a few Irish aboard—perhaps a dozen—though, of course, they generally go by way of Liverpool. Most of them had had their passage paid on this side of the water, or the money remitted to them, by their kinsfolk in America: a practice which is so common and so generously exercised that it reflects great credit on the kindness and warmth of heart of these poor people, whom I'd like to like, if it weren't so evident that they all hate Englishmen and regard them as their natural enemies. There are so many here, in the United States, that you wonder how any can be left in their own country. They all seem to thrive, too, and are a pretty formidable element in the ever-seething cauldron of American politics. Those aboard the "Cayuga" were so ragged that you could have believed Hood's joke about the English beggars sending all their old clothes to Ireland. They had the half-cunning, half-humorous faces we are all so familiar with. Some of the young women were handsome, but most of the old ones seemed to have come into the world predestined to sell apples and mumble short-pipes at street corners.

We Britons were too various for general description, and I don't want to catalogue individuals. I must, however, find room for one, who was quite a character on board—the husband of the woman whom Dick saved from drowning. He rather attached himself to us, in consequence; though I'm not sure that he ought to have regarded it as a favor, for the pair quarrelled like cat and dog throughout the voyage, as we had plenty of opportunities of observing, from their living in the opposite compartment. Fancy a little man—the shortest I have ever seen out of a show, for he couldn't have been five feet high—not at all bad looking, very good natured and extremely conceited; also so communicative that he told everybody who would listen to him all about his personal history, even to the minutest particulars—such as you couldn't listen to without laughing. Thus we learned that he had been pitchforked into the world at a very early age, owing to his mother's second marriage; had turned printer's devil; lived up all sorts of queer courts and alleys about Fleet Street; experienced all kinds of ups and downs amid shifty, shabby people; been fallen in love with by a woman old enough to be his grandmother, whom he wouldn't marry and was obliged to run away from; was near dying of cholera in a hospital, where a beautiful mysterious lady came to see him and claimed him as her son—and ever so much more, which would double the length of this letter in telling. Ultimately he had determined on emigration, with his big, black-haired, sulky-looking wife, who couldn't read or write; and who had walked all the way to London from "the black country" to be married to him, on the strength of what he called "a few idle gallantries" paid to her during his visit, as a journeyman printer, to Wolverhampton. Poor little Bowers! notwithstanding his enormous vanity and extraordinary stories (or because of them), he became a great favorite on board: people liked him and played all manner of tricks on him. He was persuaded into sending a challenge to Maberley, on the pretext that he "took liberties" when Mrs. Bowers accidentally ran into his arms during a lurch of the vessel; and proposed a duel with pistols, on the hurricane deck, at day-break, for which the mate threatened to put him in irons. And the sailors enticed him aloft and then made a "spread-eagle" of him, by tying him to the rigging, until he sang "Rule Britannia" (he was very proud of his slugging) and "stood" some rum. Also he distinguished himself in "chicken-fights," a maritime amusement, which I shall describe for the benefit of Frank—who, however, mustn't try it on Mills. The two combatants squat down on the deck, with their hands tied at the wrists, and clasp their knees, while a stick is passed under their legs and across their arms. Thus pinioned, they are set face to face, and the game consists in trying to upset each other, by inserting each other's toes under his antagonist's boot-soles. As neither can stir without risking his equilibrium, and both are utterly helpless when overthrown, you may imagine the absurdity.

In a five week's voyage you have plenty of time for getting acquainted with your fellow-passengers; and it is pleasant to observe how kind and friendly you become, and how much easier it is to like than dislike your fellow-creatures. To be sure some of them quarrelled occasionally, but there was much more joking and telling stories and reading, chatting, and card-playing; and if an Irishman did set his blanket afire by surreptitiously smoking in bed, he was put out with a pall of dirty water chucked over him—so no harm came of it. I would defy the strongest believer in your cheerful doctrine of total depravity to go the rounds of the steerage of an emigrant ship and witness the general good humor, the mutual forbearance, the making the best of inconveniences, and numberless little friendly offices of poor people not long ago entire strangers to each other, without thinking there is some good in human nature, after all. And if he sailed with them—say across the Black Hole, or deepest spot between the Old and New World, on a good, wild night, when the wind was shrieking and howling like the refrain of Tennyson's "Sisters," and the black, awful sea looked the embodiment of resistance, remorseless cruelty, contrasted with which his vessel seemed a mere egg-shell for frailty—I shouldn't wonder if he mightn't go below and turn in, loving everybody heartily. We should all have been downright sorry at parting, if anybody could be sorry at reaching land after so much salt water.

As we got into warmer latitudes and approached the American continent, the weather became magnificent. I never saw such sunsets or such colors, in water. By night the sea was phosphorescent—all alive with bright sparks, which danced and leaped and swirled and eddied until they drifted off into the great broad track of foam in our wake, serpentine out into the darkness. By day the waves reminded me of—I was going to say Turner's pictures, but even he never painted, although he may have dreamed of, such pearly whites, living emerald-greens and gushes as of submarine sunlight, as we saw over the side of the "Cayuga," while all around stretched the blue-black, illimitable waters of the Atlantic. I used to lean over the stern for hours together, thinking of Tennyson's Mermaid and Mermaid, and Kingsley's Water-Babies, with my face turned towards you and England. Also I had a gloomy satisfaction in keeping my watch at London time, so that I might imagine what you were doing.

ARITHMETICAL RELIGION.—The following is a translation from the Spanish of a printed document which was picked up by an officer of the U. S. Army, in a room of the palace occupied by Lieut.-Gen. Scott, while in the city of Mexico. On the printed sheet was an illustration of the Crucifixion of our Lord:—

"Copy of an account found in the Holy Sepulchre of our Lord Jesus Christ, in possession of the Holy Pontiff, in his Oratory, and also of King Philip IV., engraved on a plate of silver. It states that St. Bridget, and St. Elizabeth Queen of Hungary, having offered up a supplication to our Lord Jesus Christ, and being desirous to learn the details of the last sufferings of the Redeemer, he appeared unto them and spoke as follows:—

"Know ye, beloved daughters, that the soldiers, my captors, numbered 205—that I was placed in the custody of 25. They gave me 110 cuffs to excite me to anger. I received 80 blows on the mouth; on the breast 150; and tied to a pillar they inflicted 5670 lashes. My flesh was torn in 101 places, and I received 1800 mortal stabs. Bearing the Holy (?) Cross I fell thrice, and the blood that flowed from my wounds was 300,670 drops.

"To those who shall say 7 Pater Nosters and 7 Aves for the space of 12 years, until the same attain the number of drops of blood that I shed, I will grant 5 mercies.

"1. Remission of all sins.

"2. Remission from the torments of Purgatory.

"3. Should the individual die before the expiration of the 12 years, he or she shall be entitled to the full benefit of the entire 12.

"4. I shall come down from heaven to earth to take his or her soul to my arms, and this mercy shall be extended to his or her relations.

"5. Those who shall have a copy of this about them shall be free from the evil spirit, and shall not die a violent death. Moreover, the devil shall be cast out of every house possessing a copy of this. Four days before their death my blessed Mother will descend to earth to bear them company and bring them comfort. The woman who shall have a copy of this about her, being in danger of childbirth, shall be safely delivered.

"The bearer of this must inscribe name and date.

SMITTEN BY GOD.—One night this week a young man left the Union Methodist Episcopal Church during services, and, as he passed out, a gentleman overheard him say that if he never got religion until he got it by kneeling at a Methodist altar, he certainly would be damned. The next night Rev. Mr. Chadwick, the pastor of the church, referred to the above remark, and stated that the young man who made it was then speechless, and his death was looked for hourly.—*Covington Cor. of Cin. "PLEASE RENEW!"

Bills have just been sent from THE INDEX Office to more than a thousand subscribers to the paper whose terms have recently expired, and to various other parties owing money to the Association. Every one of these who promptly remits the amount helps to repair the damage of the past six months: every one who neglects to do this helps to increase the damage by perpetuating it. It is hoped that the paper can be enlarged again very soon; but if not, the $3.00 now paid will cover a proportional term of subscription.

A RARE CHANCE FOR CLUBS.

To clubs of three or more new subscribers, THE INDEX will be sent for one year at $2.00 each, provided $2.00 are remitted with the name in every case. This offer does not include old subscribers, and it is limited to the first day of September. The names must be all new, and must be sent in by September 1.

Here is a splendid chance for all disinterested friends of THE INDEX and its ideas to increase its circulation. For a few weeks only the above offer will stand. Among our subscribers are many earnest and active women who profoundly sympathize with the paper. We appeal especially to them to form clubs everywhere. Who will respond? Roll up the lists!

THE REMOVAL OF THE INDEX.

The following generous letter explains itself:

"NEW HARTFORD, Oneida Co., N. Y., June 29, 1873.

"Dear Sir,—Though not qualified to judge of the comparative advantages of New York and Boston, and having consequently no preference, I shall be prepared to give $5.00 towards the enterprise of transplanting THE INDEX to either field, as soon as I am notified that contributions to that purpose are in order; and am very respectfully,
WM. DUDGEON.

"MR. ABBOT."
In response we would say that such pledges as the above are entirely "in order," and will be very gladly received. So important to the future prosperity of the paper and the increase of its influence, so essential to the success of its attempts to carry forward the religious development of this country and the world in the direction of a larger practical freedom and higher spiritual truth, do we consider the establishment of THE INDEX in a place where its roots can strike deep, that we propose to spend several weeks in direct personal efforts to accomplish this result. Before this reaches our readers, we shall be on our way eastward, hoping and expecting to find cordial co-operation in an undertaking which is not ours, but freedom's and truth's. Whoever is willing to help it onward should write immediately how much he will contribute to the removal, to the address of "F. E. Abbot, care of Charles Vaughan, Esq., Cambridge, Mass." It will be possible to get along in Toledo with THE INDEX at the reduced size, without regular contributors, and with a stationary or very slowly increasing circulation; but if the paper is to become a felt power in moulding public opinion and arousing public action in behalf of "liberty and light," it must be helped out of the difficulties into which it has been most treacherously betrayed, established in Boston or New York, and enabled to resume the enlarged size, to concentrate in its pages the genius and earnestness of the best minds, and by its intrinsic excellence to command the enthusiasm of its friends and the dismay of its enemies. Frankly, we confess that we shall be greatly disappointed and disheartened, if our hard work of the past three years and a half has done nothing to stir up a spirit of courage, devotedness, and willingness to give and to do, in the hearts of American liberals. It will be humiliating indeed if free thought shall prove to be incorrigibly inferior to Christianity in public-spiritedness and noble liberality for the noblest ends. By no fault of ours, THE INDEX now needs money to do its great work greatly: it is unnecessary to expatiate here on the why or the wherefore, but that is the fact. Shall it be left to struggle alone out of the slough, or perhaps be abandoned in it? Or shall the men and women who comprehend and welcome the extreme word of radicalism prove that their hearts are as large as their heads are clear?

"SORE, SICKLY MORALITY."

Senator Carpenter's recent speech at Jamesville, Wisconsin, is the high-water mark of modern "corruptionism." As reported, it is a brazen defence of the Crédit Mobilier and "back salary grab" transactions. The closing portion of it reads thus:—

"Washington left the impress of his character upon his own and succeeding generations. Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, and others gave an impulse to public thought, and fixed a standard of public virtue under which we have grown to be a great and happy people. But it was left for Oakes Ames to lift the standard of public virtue clean out of mortal sight. Things which, viewed in the light of our Savior's teachings, and estimated by the standard of Christian morality, are as harmless as the cooing of a dove, are larcenies, mortal sins, in the light of 1873, and estimated by the standard of alarm and fright created by Oakes Ames and the Crédit Mobilier investigation. Earthquakes sometimes come and storms sometimes rage, but the earth will not always rock nor rains always fall, and we may hope that the present sore, sickly morality will sometime give place to the manly and healthy virtue taught by the Master of Nazareth."

It will take more than the teachings of the "Master of Nazareth" to extirpate the "present sore, sickly morality," by which is meant the indignation of the people at the proceedings defended so audaciously by the honorable Senator. It is bad enough when the United States are disgraced throughout Europe by the misconduct of our Commissioners at the Vienna Exposition,—when the American minister to England is mixed up in a fraudulent mining scheme into which the British public have been inveigled to the extent of £1,000,000,—when General Fremont stands convicted by the French courts, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment, for a "complicity in a gigantic fraud by which hundreds of poor French peasants were induced to buy worthless bonds of a bogus Texan railroad, on the strength of a forged certificate;" but it is intolerable public shame when a member of the United States Senate openly scoffs at the "sore, sickly morality" which refuses to admire the pillaging of the Treasury by himself and his associates as an illustration of the "manly and healthy virtue" indicated by "our Savior's teachings!" If this is the virtue commanded by the Christian gospel, so much the worse for the gospel. The only hope for America is the fact that politicians guilty of such "virtue," and such defence of it, are now unpitifully dragged from the Nazarene skirts to which they cling, and set in the pillory of the public contempt; and that their political prospects are even more "sore and sickly" than the "morality" from which they fled to take refuge behind the "Savior." Unless public opinion now gets well cured of its reverence for the "Christian statesmanship" which lies and steals in the name of the "Master of Nazareth," the destiny of the Republic will be one from which every true patriot may well avert his eyes. The gospel now needed by this country is not the Christian one, but rather, as the New York Nation some months ago faithfully pointed out, the gospel of common honesty. Away with the canting hypocrisy, which uses the name of Jesus to obfuscate the public conscience, and seeks to clothe naked swindlers with the sanctities of a still powerful superstition! It is high time to come back to the simplicity of radicalism, and learn to see nothing sacred but the homely virtues of truthfulness, justice, uprightness, fidelity, honor!

QUAKER REVIVALS.

"For me the silent reverence, where My brethren gather, slow and calm."
WHITTIER.

Where is gone the dignity that marked the "Friends' Meetings" of other days? The thoughtful silence, the long patience, the gentleness, the solemnity, the pauses? The great cathedrals of Europe, on whose stillness a thousand worshippers make scarce a ripple, are hardly so peaceful as those serene occasions. No matter what was said or done, there was refreshment in what was left undone and unsaid; the speeches might be dull, but the silences worked conviction. The Spirit might not always seem effectual when it moved, but it was heavenly when it restrained.

Does it restrain now? Not a bit of it. Go into the great Yearly Meeting at Newport, and instead of those grave elders on the high seats—or above them and controlling them—you see a nervous, feverish, eager man, in the attire of the world's people, and with all the air of an excited Second-Advent exhorter. He it is who leads the revival, fills up the pauses, cracks the spiritual whip over the heads of the timid, the doubtful, the modest. "There is no time to lose," he says; "Jesus is here—this moment may be the last of your lives. Confess his name before men; give yourselves openly to him, and he will save you." Amid sobs and tears, the excitement begins. The old, the young, the children, rise eagerly to say that all is right with their souls, and to urge each other to do the like. Waiting on the Spirit? That inspiring, restraining "Inward Light" seems as obsolete as the old French monarchy; it is as superfluous as Louis Napoleon after the Commune had set in. This noisy, spiritual Commune has its day at last, and there is a feverish excitement in which the Goddess Reason, instead of being set up, is thrown down.

In the older speakers, together with some of the Quaker sing-song, there lingers something of the old Quaker simplicity. Among the younger there is sometimes a real modesty, and you see that these were children have the sense to feel a little reluctance to boast of their own spiritual victories before an assemblage of five or six hundred people. More often they stand up, eager and unabashed, to "testify," without an apparent struggle. A young girl of seventeen stops crunching candy, wipes her fingers with a very sticky handkerchief, and rises to proclaim the sweets of religion; tells her tale in the established phrases, and subsiding, presently resumes the candy. A child of ten or twelve, near me, who had seemed quite absorbed in a new and showy fan, was presently nudged by her mother or sister, and sprang up to repeat a little Sunday-school verse; then reverted to the contemplation of the fan again. Other very young people offered prayers of great length. Often two or three began to speak at once, and reluctantly, though courteously, yielded to one another. Meanwhile I watched with eagerness the revival leader; there was a nervous excitement about him that made it impossible for him to keep still a single instant—head, eyes, shoulders, fingers, were all in uneasy motion. Yet instead of the excitement taking the form of absorbed attention, it seemed like the undevout solicitude of an auctioneer inviting bids, or the master of the ring watching the feats of the circus. During one of the most zealous prayers made by the juveniles, this leader sat with eyes open, looking about him, nervously adjusting his hair and his finger nails, noticing the windows that were opened, the settees that were brought in. An average Roman Catholic priest in Europe, taking snuff at the most solemn moment of the High Mass, does not impress the beholder with more entire incongruity with what he represents, than did this leader of the revival. I do not assert that he was not sincere; but it seemed the sincerity of a pianotuner, or an orchestra-leader,—anything but that of a saint or prophet.

The only effort I saw to calm the excitement was when one of the elders, apparently not a revivalist, rose to suggest that there should be a few moments spent in silence before the meeting closed. The instant he sat down, a stentorian voice burst forth behind him and prayed for the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, in tones that might have been heard half a mile. The moment he had done, the leading revivalists shook hands with one another, to close the meeting; as if there was nothing they so dreaded as that interval of silence.
